It was the year 3093. The Stanford University was holding its twelve-hundredth anniversary. For three centuries and more the great stone wall and bridge across the bay at Ravenswood had been completed, so that most of the professors from the elder university at Berkeley came by this route, looking down on the upper bay, changed into fields, with orchards of two hundred and fifty years' establishment growing where the nineteenth century sloops and oyster-boats came to the prehistoric embarcaderos of Mowry's Landing and Alviso. A great industrial university. Workshops reaching for miles along the beautiful slopes of San Mateo, training-schools, art-schools, language-schools, scientific-schools. Berkeley for the classics and the humanities, Stanford University for an unparalleled grouping of the great industrial and scientific activities of the race. For mile beyond mile ran the gardens, the greenhouses, the intensiv horticulture which for more than a thousand years had made the valley regions of California the richest and most thickly populated district in the world. Statistics from the census of the year 3090: "Population of California, forty-seven millions; population of the valleys which impinge upon San Francisco, including the valleys caused by the drainage of Suisun bay, San Pablo bay, and the upper half of San Francisco bay, twenty-eight millions. One-half of these are in the Sacramento-San Joaquin valley, the other half within fifty miles of San Francisco city."

The president of the university, Leland Stanford Ainsworth, a descendant of one of the Oregon Ainsworths of the nineteenth century, delivered his address, "Science is endless." He said: "The race goes on, ever improving. Those were foolish fears of the men of the Dark Ages, now almost prehistoric, when this state was founded, this institution established. The social order has changed. What they called revolution, and vainly fought, has proved evolution. We hav come together, on this twelve-hundredth anniversary, under these ancient stone arches, less to celebrate the past than to plan for new conquests of nature. Whispers hav gone forth to the world that in our chemical laboratory strange discoveries hav been made. These discoveries we giv to you to-day, whether for human happiness or human misery will depend upon yourselvs."

The audience listened with some bewilderment. In that great hall, with its arches of weather-beaten stone, more than forty thousand people were assembled, but delicate electrical machinery made the speaker's voice audible and the speaker's face clearly visible to everyone in the building, and even to the thousands who sat beneath the stately oaks outside.

What was this new discovery? Would it make life better worth living? Would it giv a man longer life? At least it was evident that the discovery was one of thrilling importance in the mind of the president. He spoke with the utmost earnestness. "For more than one hundred years this university has held as a sacred trust a group of scientific discoveries made by one of its students. He wrote his formulas down and sealed them for this twelve-hundredth anniversary. Three days before its celebration, the faculty of this university was to assemble, break the seals, test the formulas, and decide whether to reveal the secrets or to destroy them forever. We met; we hav decided; we create a new professorship, more important, perhaps, than any other in existence on the face of the earth. We hav chosen a lineal descendant of the discoverer of this group of secrets, Prof. Lemuel Jones Carey, and going back to one of the almost forgotten writers of the nineteenth century, we name his chair the chair of 'The Ethics of Dust.'"

A ripple of half-annoyed amusement ran over the audience. Was that all? Only another of those interminable modern subdivisions of biology or psychology, or both?

But the president went on: "Professor Carey was on the right track when this event occurred. It is remarkable that all his investigations hav fitted him to utilize and develop this group of new facts. Without him the Ethics of Dust would hav had to wait fifty years for an interpreter. With him you can catch a glimpse of its scope to-day. It is nothing that you imagin. It is not long life; it is not money or happiness, except incidentally. But perhaps it means all the things which any of you, or all of you, hav ever dreamed about." And the president sat down. The wall at the back of the stage opened and revealed a laboratory, strange even to the eyes of chemists there. Professor Carey came forward, and set a curious microscope on the stand. Then he looked over the audience and spoke of the great subject.

"What we hav done is to conquer the ultimate atom, and discover whether it is healthy or not. If it is diseased it will produce disease—mental, moral, or physical, as the case may be. Every one of us has diseased atoms in his system. That is what makes us die too soon; sometimes that is what makes us do wrong. When we find the diseased atom, we cannot destroy it. Nothing can. But we can now isolate it so that it can do no harm—at least, not for ages to come, perhaps never again. We can force each atom—each dust-mote which floats about the world—to tell its story; can discover where it has been and what it has done, and whether it is helpful or hurtful. Since the number of atoms in the atmosphere of the earth is now definitly ascertained, it only remains for the human race to isolate from further evil the diseased atoms as fast as possible. Then, a few centuries from now, only healthy atoms will remain. This, as I need not explain to you, must mean perfect health, and a great many other things which the newspapers will tell you about."

A great hush fell on the audience, as they understood this stupendous claim. Then murmurs and cries began to break forth, as people suddenly spoke to each other, forgetting all else in the presence of the fact. The ultimate atom had been conquered. That was what science and theology for thousands of years had said could never be done. Did it mean wiping out the secret sins, taking away the daily temptation from each one? A woman, rich, beautiful, fashionable, rose in the audience, and reached out her hands to Professor Carey. "Take away my selfishness!" she cried. A man in the prime of life, famous over the continent, rose, and called with deep voice of passion, "Take away that which once made me false to my oath!" The professor reached his hands out, and said in a tone which stilled the tempest:

"I cannot. No one can. You liv and die in the race. If the atoms which work you evil come to me, I will bind them fast. I can not draw them from you. Cast them out so that humanity may put them in chains. Help others to cast them out. Help me in my work. It is atom by atom that we rebuild the ruined human temple."

The man and the woman sank in their places and a great pent-up sigh swept over the audience, but no one spoke again.

The professor went on: "All things tell their secrets at last. Every mote of dust has its story, from the pollen-dust of the wild rose on the slopes of Chimborazo to the star-dust left but yesterday in our atmosphere by the great comet Hierophanta. Here, in this room, there is dust from the ruins of ancient London, earthquake-swallowed five centuries ago. Out of the caves of the giant cave-bear of Europe, out of the castles of robber-barons on the Rhine, out of the depths of the ocean and the heart of the earth, these dust-motes come in our midst, after myriad wanderings, and our science can now reveal the story of each one of them all."

The professor bent, and looked through his microscope. "There is a flake of dust here," he said, "which we will examin. It floated on the plate just now while I was speaking." He threw a magnified reflection on a screen, till the flake of dust seemed a hundred feet across; he dropped chemicals upon it, and winnowed everything from the center. There was the atom at last; all the rest that it had drawn to itself had disappeared.

Again the professor spoke: "It is evil, and yet you shall see it." On the screen fell the reflection of a vast drop of blood, and in the heart of the drop was a picture of strife on a desert edge, near a palm by an altar, and a clock struck the centuries backward in the ears of the audience, till they knew that the blood was the first drop of blood ever shed in the world from man by his fellow-man.

"It is an atom," said the professor, "that makes disease wherever it goes. Now it shall wander forth no longer." He put it into one of his vials and fastened it up. Then he went on with dust-mote after dust-mote from the air about him, and showed the audience pictures of the heart-atoms of each, which thrilled and convinced every man and woman there. The assembly laughed and cried. They yielded to his mighty spell; they accepted the stupendous secret. The ultimate atom was no more a profound mystery, but a creature to be captured, named, analyzed, and imprisoned by star-eyed science.

Then the professor was asked to cast the magnified reflection of an atom on the screen without first examining it himself. He looked at the audience again with that indescribably sad expression.

"Not yet; perhaps never," he said. "I see more than I am able to tell you, more than any man with the heart of a man could describe. I read your hearts, I know your thoughts, I see the record of your sins, as I look upon these atoms which float in your atmosphere. My only happiness is that each one of the diseased atoms I can find, by so much I lessen the folly, the falsehood, the evil of all sorts that fills every atmosphere, even here, even now. It is our heritage, the sad heritage of the whole human race, through ages of wretchedness and crime. I will only show you what you can bear; the rest I will carry along." He closed his laboratory and left the stage.

The audience rose with a great sigh and went out, some few were rejoicing, but most were oppressed with the vast and mysterious forces thus newly given to the human race.

The professor, wrapped in a profound sadness, sat alone in his study; and here the president of the university found him some hours later, with his head on his desk—dead. He had written on a piece of paper:

"After all, I think we were too ambitious. The atoms will make all of us enemies to each other. My old heart disease is coming back, but to-morrow I shall ask the faculty to wait another fifty years."—Charles Howard Shinn in the Argonaut.

ARGUMENT

BY

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

AT Johnstown several survivors hav become insane. Militia and laborers under General Hastings, acting for the state, are clearing the wreckage. Many laborers who thought themselvs underpaid rioted, and the militia had to quell them. The bodies of the victims are greatly decomposed, often beyond identification.

IN response to a request from the New York Sabbath Committee "that the representativs of our government at the Paris Exposition be instructed in their official capacity to recognize the observance of Sunday in accordance with the laws and customs of the American people," Secretary of State Blaine replies that the suggestion meets with his cordial approval, and that appropriate instructions hav been given to our minister at Paris and commissioner-general.

AN old parson in a country town in this state recently made this singular statement in the course of a sermon: "They are wrong to cry so against tattle of women. It is sometimes of use. I find an example in the New Testament. At Easter why did not our Lord Jesus Christ appear first to men? Why did he prefer to show himself to women? Simply for this reason—because the news of his resurrection would be sooner spread."—San Francisco Wasp.

THE editor of the Sioux City Journal came out on Sunday with a long and cheerful article treating of hell. He furnished conclusiv evidence to show that hell is one of the most disagreeable places ever discovered, and claimed that no greater insult can be offered a man than to invite him to go to that torrid realm. The Journal is probably correct. If all accounts are trustworthy the resort in question must be positivly unpleasant. Nothing could be more repulsiv to a refined person than to be suddenly called upon to sit over a slow fire and be baked for a million consecutiv ages. Let us all endeavor to be nobler and better men.—Nebraska State Journal.

SHE'S fairer than a lily,
And she's sweeter than a rose,
And she knocks the neighbors silly
When she wields the garden hose.

She lifts her skirts from danger
With her left hand, while her right
Grasps the nozzle, and the stranger
Gets a very pleasing sight.

For she's always fresh and rosy,
And she seems so sweet and fair,
As she sprinkles every posy
With the most impartial care.

The neighbors' eyes all twinkle
And their interest daily grows,
For they like to see her sprinkle,
And they like to see the hose.

A MAN wearing the evidences of a tiresome journey dismounted from a jaded horse at the door of a cabin near the Arkansas line of the Indian Territory, and, speaking to an old fellow who advanced to meet him, said: "My friend, I am worn out and am hungry. Can you giv me shelter and something to eat?" The old fellow picked a wood tick out of his whiskers, and, looking at it, answered: "I dunno 'zackly, but we mout, as sich things hav been did. Whut's yo' name?" "Marcus White." "Ah, hah! They call you Mark, I reckon?" "Yes." "Wall, my name is Matthew, an' I've got a son named Luke and one John All uv us tergether would make a sort of gospel team, wouldn't we?" "Yes," said Mr. White, smiling, "but the question now is, can I find accommodation here?" "Hitch yo' hoss an' come in, an' we'll see about it." When White went into the house a shrunken woman, mumbling over her knitting, made room for him by shoving back her chair without getting up, and a jute-haired child, with a hunk of corn bread in its hand, scrambled under the bed. "Set down, Mr. Mark," said old Matthew. "Tildy" (addressing his wife), "you mout hussle round now an' git this here hongry man suthin' ter eat. You mout go out thar an' kill that old hen that's been a-settin' fur two weeks on them pieces uv brickbats. Bile her long enough an' I reckon we ken chaw her." The woman wiped her nose on her knitting and went out, and pretty soon there arose the distressing cry of an old hen. "Mr. Mark," said old Matthew, "you are religious, I hope." "Yes, I try to be." "Glad ter hear it, fur nobody but religious folks can claim anything offen me. You believe that Aaron made a steer outen gold, don't you?" "Yes, a calf." "Air you shore it was a ca'f?" "I am quite sure." "Wall, then, we won't argy. All I want is ter settle the fack uv yo' belief, fur, ez I tell you, I am a religious man, dyed in the wool an' baptized in the feathers. You believe that old 'Lisha made the he-bears eat up forty children, don't you?" "They were she bears." "Air you certain about that p'int?" "Yes, I am positiv." "Wall, it don't make no diffunce so long as you believe it. Now, lemme see. It's my habit, you understand, to investigate these things. I wouldn't let a Inferdel stay in my house five minits, if I knowed it, fur nothin' in the world. You believe that Moses split the sea, don't you?" "Yes." "Glad—glad to know that you air a Christian gentleman. But I hear my boys Luke and John a-comin'. They've been over inter Bucksnort county ter settle a little diffikelty." When the boys, two gaunt fellows, came into the room the old man said: "Boys, this is Mr. Mark. Set down thar, now, an' tell me how the thing come out. Did you find old man Bender?" "Yas, suh," said one of the boys. "Whut did you do with him?" "Tied him ter a tree." "Good! Then what did you do?" "We cut some hickories an' whipped him." "Good!" the old man exclaimed. "Did he howl?" "Bawled like er cow." "Good! How many did you hit him?" "Fifty." "Fustrate. Then what?" "We left him tied thar." "Fustrate. Mr. Mark," he added, speaking to the guest, "that oughter teach him a lesson." "What had he done to deserve such a punishment?" "Oh, he sued me for a saddle I borrid from him. Left him tied, eh? Fustrate!" They continued to talk, and the odor of the boiling hen floated into the room. A gathering cloud which all day had been making threats burst into a downpour of rain. "Mr. Mark," said the host, "I wanter ax you another question. We must hav a little liberality, you know, ez well ez belief. Do you b'l've that Adam was made outer dust?" "Well, strictly speaking, I do not." "What! don't believe that Adam was made outer dust?" "To tell you the truth, I do not." "Well, then, git outer this house right smart; get right out." "My dear sir, this rain-storm——" "Git out (springing to his feet) or I'll hurt you. I don't want the lightnin' ter strike my house jest because I've got a Inferdel here. Git out." "Won't you giv me a piece of that chicken, please?" "Not a speck. I ain't gwine to giv the lightnin' the slightest excuse for business. No Inferdels harbored here. Git!" Mr. Marcus White rode into the storm.—Arkansaw Traveler.

RELIGION seems everywhere invented solely to lull the people in the lap of slavery, in order that their masters may easily oppress them, or render them wretched with impunity.—D'Holbach.

IN every country, religion has represented the monarch of nature as a cruel, fantastical, partial tyrant, whose caprice is law. The monarch God is but too faithfully imitated by his representativs on earth.—The Beacon.

THE God idea is the foundation of tyranny and slavery. The heavenly ruler must hav his vicegerents on earth. King, priest, and master oppress humanity by virtue of "God's word," which enjoins obedience to the powers that be. Man will not be free until he escapes from the conception of a being superior to himself. By this imagined authority the king says, Obey or be killed; the priest says, Believe or be damned; the master says, Submit or starve. God, king, priest, and master must giv place to the equal brotherhood of man.—Robert C. Adams in Pioneer Pith.

THERE is a topic to which I allude with diffidence; but in the spirit of frankness. It is the influence which war, though condemned by Christ, has derived from the Christian church.—Charles Sumner.

WHAT earthly reason can a man hav to dread discussion, but that his opinion will not bear it?—Dr. Thomas Cooper.

IF a man should tell you that he had the most beautiful painting in the world, and after taking you where it was, should insist upon having your eyes shut, you would probably suspect, either that he had no painting or that it was some pitiable daub. Should he tell you that he was a most excellent performer on the violin, and yet refuse to play unless your ears were stopped, you would think, to say the least of it, that he had an odd way of convincing you of his musical ability. But would his conduct be any more wonderful than that of a religionist who asks that, before examining his creed, you will hav the kindness to throw away your reason? The first gentleman says, "Keep your eyes shut, my picture will bear everything but being seen;" "Keep your ears stopped, my music objects to nothing but being heard." The last says, "Away with your reason, my religion dreads nothing but being understood."—Ingersoll

THESE are strange marks of truth which Pascal offers. What other marks has falsehood? What? is it sufficient in order to be believed, to say, "I am obscure, I am unintelligible?"—Voltaire.

IT is impossible to calculate the moral mischief, if I may so express it, that mental lying has produced in society. When a man has so far corrupted and prostituted the chastity of his mind, as to subscribe his professional belief to things he does not believe, he has prepared himself for the commission of every other crime.—Paine.

THE reading of books in defense of the old revelations against the attacks of the discoveries of science is no pleasant reading. The attempts at direct defense of errors, and, where direct defense is plainly impossible, the attempts at reconcilement of the new truths with the old errors, are repulsiv to an open, honest, truth-loving mind. On the part of theology there is, therefore, in modern days, when a transition is taking place from the principles of theology to the principles of science, a distinct tendency to weaken instead of to strengthen veracity—one of the most essential virtues in the moral code. This, in a scientific age, must be the result of "accepting revelation," "clinging to creeds," and "loving finality in belief." The whole spirit and all the methods of science hav exactly the opposit tendency. Truth, and truth alone, is the object of all her love, the reward of all her labor, and the goal of all her ambition. Falsehood and error are to her the greatest of enemies, and from them she shrinks with instinctiv fear.—John Wilson, M.A., in Thoughts on Science, Theology, and Ethics.

A REPORT has been presented to the Anthropological Society of Paris of some interesting observations on that portion of the brain known as Broca's convolution, which modern research shows must be recognized as the seat of memory and speech. This convolution is absent in all animals below the higher apes, and appears among them only in a simple and rudimentary form, being fully developed in man alone. In idiots, deaf mutes, and all persons of inferior intelligence it is always more or less atrophied.

THERE are more people trying to get into Johnstown now than are trying to get out of it. "We hav applications every day," said one member of a firm that is largely interested in one of the mills there, "from men who are anxious to go there to get work as soon as we start up. You see, they think that on account of the deaths of so many people there will be vacancies."

A WRITER in the June North American Review estimates that, allowing mankind to use twice as much fuel as it does now, the world's supply will be exhausted in twelve thousand years. It is desirable, therefore, to economize, and there is plenty of room to do this, since, according to the same authority, our best steam-making boilers waste four-fifths of the potential energy of the coal or wood they consume.

THE greatest Mussulman educational center in northern Africa is the University of Garouin in Morocco. The students number about seven hundred, and there are forty professors. Work begins between half past 2 and 5 in the morning, according to the season. The first instruction consists of comments on the Koran. At sunrise the second batch of professors—about a dozen or so—discourse on law and dogma. In the afternoon grammar and rhetoric are taught, and later logic, astronomy, arithmetic, geography, history, Mussulman literature, and the science of talismanic numbers or the determination by calculation of the influence of angels, spirits, and stars on future events. The foredetermination of the conqueror and conquered in a coming war seems to be a special branch. There is the greatest difficulty in obtaining a professor intimate with the principles of the science in its entirety. There are no examinations. Every professor is supposed to know those among his hearers who are worthy of diplomas. The diplomas are very highly valued and giv the holders great prestige in the Moslem world.

INDIA, it would seem, is practically uneducated. The total number of scholars in schools and colleges of all sorts is only three and a quarter millions, or one and a half per cent of the entire population. These are mainly confined to the cities and towns; and out of 250,000,000 in all India, less than 11,000,000 can read and write. A census of the illiterates in the various countries of the world, recently published in the Statistiche Monatsschrift, places the three Slavic states of Roumania, Servia, and Russia at the head of the list, with about 80 per cent of the population unable to read and write. Of the Latin-speaking races, Spain heads the list with 63 per cent, followed by Italy with 48 per cent, France and Belgium having about 15 per cent. The illiterates in Hungary number 43 per cent, in Austria 39, and in Ireland 21. In England we find 13 per cent, Holland 10 per cent, United States (white population) 8 per cent, and Scotland 7 per cent, unable to read and write. When we come to the purely Teutonic states, we find a marked reduction in the percentage of illiterates. The highest is in Switzerland, 2.5; in the whole German empire it is 1 per cent; in Sweden, Denmark, Bavaria, Baden, and Würtemberg, there is practically no one who cannot read and write.

COLONEL KNOX of Texas Siftings overheard this interesting dialog: "Wanamaker (to the editor of the Mail and Express): "I rejoice to see, Colonel Shepard, that you hav succeeded in having the Fifth avenue stages taken off on Sunday." Colonel Shepard (rubbing his hands with satisfaction): "Yes, sir. It was a desecration of the Sabbath day, and I stopped it. To be sure, it didn't pay to run the stages on Sunday, but I would hav stopped them just the same if it had." Wanamaker: "I've no doubt of it, colonel. George [to his secretary standing by], hav you made arrangements for the government revenue cutter to take us down the bay Sunday morning to meet the incoming steamer on which Mrs. Wanamaker arrives?" George: "Yes, sir. All the arrangements are completed." Wanamaker: "That's right." To Colonel Shepard: "It devolves upon us, colonel, to push the movement for suppressing Sunday travel. I expect to stop the carrying of mails on Sunday before my administration is much older." Colonel Shepard: "That's right, and I am with you. No labor whatever should be performed on Sunday. [To a Mail and Express reporter standing near]: Mr. Faber, be sure and attend Father McGlynn's lecture Sunday afternoon and make a page report of it for Monday's paper. [To Mr. Wanamaker:] Don't you think that passenger as well as mail trains should be stopped on Sunday?" Wanamaker: "Most certainly I do. [To his secretary:] O George! don't fail to secure parlor chairs on the Sunday afternoon express for our party to go to Washington." George: "It is all attended to, sir." Wanamaker: "Thanks. And now, colonel, let us evolve a plan for stopping all travel and work on Sunday."

Of "the Divinity that Shapes Our Ends."

For several years I hav been the owner of a remarkable hen. Not remarkable in size or personal appearance. Like Alexander, 'tis not her stature makes her great, but greatness of her deeds. She is a medium-sized, unassuming, mild-eyed, plain brown hen, without a pedigree. In the mean time, I hav been the owner of several dozen other hens; some large, some small, some with and some without pedigrees. So far as any visible matters outside of their peculiar and distinct individualities go, all of these hens hav had an equal chance to scratch for life, liberty, and happiness; for honor and fame, also. But owing, I conceive, to the superior individuality, or, perhaps, superior adaptability to surrounding conditions, "Old Browny" (that is the name of this remarkable hen) has done more business than any ten of her less favored companions. She has raised more chickens the past year than all the other hens—ten or fifteen—I own. Early in the spring she disappeared (she is the only hen on her ranch that is named or would be missed) and was mourned as dead. The children said: "Poor, dear Old Browny, she was a hen, take her for all and all, we ne'er shall look upon her like again." But one day before the snow was ripe, Old Browny came up smiling, with a fine brood of chickens for the earliest spring market, to find all her companions loafing—wating for the spring trade to open, and grumbling about the hard times. Old Browny couldn't see it. She raised most of this brood; set them up in business for themselvs very early, then hatched another brood, and did likewise with them. Then straightway another brood of fifteen, fourteen of which she raised, and pretty much "by hand." Finally, late in December, she came forth fresh and smiling with the fourth brood for the season. Altogether, Old Browny has proved a veritable Jay Gould among hens. And I think she could not help it—does not want to help it, it is true; but could not want to without a different inward individuality, or outward conditions. Meantime, but very few of Old Browny's companions were earning more than a living. And, as nearly as I could judge from appearances, the shiftless and vicious among them that would not—could not—so catch on to the situation as to scratch either profit or pleasure out of it, were busily traducing Old Browny; charging her with cornering the market; being a dangerous and oppressiv monopoly, haughty aristocrat, grasping trust, etc., and invoking and devising ways and means to make her stand and deliver because she had something and they had not—just like little men.

The close and competent observer will discover the same relativ differences among hens, dogs, horses, cows, elephants, mice, microbes, in short, in all classes of the animal kingdom, and every other kingdom, that there are among men. And are these differences, or any differences, aught but the inevitable result of the unvarying law of cause and effect, and over which the individuals hav not the slightest control? It seems to me they are not. I beg indulgence to offer a little evidence in support of this faith.

The thoroughbred hound follows a scent unerringly where there is nothing to which the nature of the common one is responsiv. The trained athlete performs physical feats that are impossible and almost incomprehensible to ordinary persons. Just so the trained mind of the naturally gifted performs feats relativly more wonderful. Why cannot the mental imbecil perform, or even comprehend them? Is it because they do not want to, and do not try? How can they want to—how try? And if they hav sense and judgment enough to want to, can they do it without the proper inward personality and outward conditions? How many men hav wanted the ability to write like Shakspere? How many hav worked harder than he did to that end? How many hav succeeded? How many hav wanted wealth, and toiled early and late to secure it, but failed!

There are many otherwise healthy, normal persons who are invariably poisoned whenever they even go near certain plants or vines that others can handle, can crush and rub their naked hands, arms, and faces with, with impunity. Of course these different effects are the results of different organizations or conditions, and not of the suspension or variation of the law of cause and effect. When called a liar, one able-bodied man preserves his dignity and temper, turns upon his heel, and walks away with only a feeling of pity for the blackguard; while another would shoot a hole through him, or send him to grass before his words were cold. Sand does nothing notable when touched by fire, but powder explodes under the same circumstances. Why? One stomach craves for codfish, another rejects and loathes it. I was long acquainted with a remarkably healthy man—he died of what is called an accident, at ninety two years of age. For many years of his life he could not eat a spoonful of chicken gravy, or a mouthful of chicken, without suffering a severe attack of cholera-morbus in consequence. For all other fare, so far as known, his stomach was normal.

I am well acquainted with a very sensible, even-tempered, healthy, courageous, middle-aged lady, who has the peculiarity of drawing the line at caterpillars so sharply, that I am confident conscious contact with one of the least of these, especially if green, would force her into convulsions. There are persons who can frequent the most vicious company without the slightest inclination to allow evil communications to corrupt their good manners. Others who go from bad to worse in the midst of the best of company. Like wolves, their vicious natures seem to thrive best among sheep.

Notwithstanding it is true that in some way enmity has been put between the serpent and women, some women coil huge villainous serpents about their naked arms, necks, and faces, and even kiss them with apparent affection. Some persons recover after having a good portion of their brains blown away, others die of a trifling scratch. One learns as by lightning express, another only at a snail's pace. One takes to music, painting, chemistry, mathematics, poetry, finance, etc., as Old Browny took to raising chickens, while others shun them as barren, even repulsiv, idealities, containing nothing to which their minds or tastes are responsiv. And why not? Why all this diversity? Why does not the thistle seed respond to soil, sunshine, and rain, by producing figs? Why does not the untutored savage respond with delight to poetry and high art or abstruse metaphysics?

Verily is not here a suggestion that will unlock these mysteries? Are not all bodies, all stomachs, all hens, all minds, all things, irresistibly responsiv, or unresponsiv, to every presence, according to their individuality—the hound and the bulldog, the plow Dobbin and the racer, the sand and the powder, the persons easily poisoned and those who resist it; the genius and the dullard; the skeptic who requires reason and proof, and the "believer" who takes absurdities on faith in proportion to their size, and swallows them deeply in proportion to the absence and impossibility of evidence?

True, one pole of the magnet attracts, the other repels. But attracts or repels what? Not everything. Not putty or pumpkins, but only what is responsiv to the subtle power. And mark, the attractiv or repulsiv power (or essence) is not in the magnet; and not in the iron or steel that seems to be attracted or repelled by it. If it were, it would draw or repel any similar weight, as a mule draws his load of anything. No; this power of the magnet, as we call it, is no more in the magnet or in the iron or steel in which it acts or seems to act, than the soap made by the union of lye and grease is in either alone or in both together before assimilation. It is only in their response; the one for, or to, the other; or the fruit thereof, and which is unlike either parent.

Is it not so with every compound? And is not every human body, impulse, thought, speech, action, or life, a compound? Would not each and all be repeated as often as the same, or precisely similar, elements should be brought together under the same conditions? How often will two plus two make four? Ask a competent philosopher or your sober sense, if like must not produce like in human life or conduct, as unerringly as in mathematics or chemistry. Appearances are often deceitful. I know to the careless observer arsenic looks much like baking powder, but it may make a wide difference if put in the biscuit instead. The scale, whether true or false, responds alike to the same weight only when the pea is in the same place. Children are different each one from every other, through every physical grade, from the short-lived born consumptiv to him of an iron constitution good for a century. Also through every mental grade, from the hopeless idiot to the Newton, they are thus or so according to conditions. And "men are but children of a larger growth," hence they are not responsiv in the same way to the same conditions—do not repel or attract, or are not repelled or attracted, in the same way. One is wax that the sun's rays soften, while another is clay which they harden. One is wet powder today, dry to-morrow.

Yet all will make the worst or best soap according to the lye of their particular individuality, and the grease (circumstances) with which they are brought in contact.

In his normal condition man receives impressions through each and all of his five senses. Every such impression and manifestation thereof is the inevitable fruit of the union. As either of these five channels of ingress for impressions may be defectiv, so may the inward mill that mixes, grinds, or assimilates them or the channel of distribution; as in the case of the insane, the blind, the deaf and dumb, the fool, the crank, the naturally vicious, etc.

Why does one man "succeed," as it is called, where another fails? The circumstances are not similar. The grease may hav been similar, but the lye was not; the scale had been tampered with, the powder was damp, etc., or the result would hav been the same as surely as sixteen ounces will always weigh just one pound on every true scale.

There are thirty-six petty criminals in Cincinnati who hav a record of an average of over ten terms of service in the workshop. One of these has served thirty-eight terms; another, thirty. If there is virtue in prayer, should not the prayers of the righteous be patterned after that of a celebrated heathen: "Great God, be kind to the wicked; thou hast been kind to the good, in making them so?"

Grant was never notably distinguished—but rather extinguished—before the late civil war brought him in contact with conditions so responsiv to his distinct personality—probably refined, annealed, and freed from slag by former experience—as to form what men call greatness. And think of the narrow escapes he had from shipwreck!

But for his opportunity in that war, which was McClellan's, Buell's, et al Nemesis, Grant would probably hav been one of the million flowers "born to blush unseen." Indeed, without fructification by the pollen of experience and the soil and climate of fitting opportunity, he, and all the great, must hav remained barren—would hav been or borne no flowers at all, any more than a rose seed or cutting planted in the end of the north pole.

Grant, Lincoln, and "all the mighty dead," responded to conditions. So did McClellan, Buell, Jeff Davis, and Judas. These, perhaps, illustrated the positiv pole of the magnet; those, the negativ.

The magnet may be a most excellent one, but, as I hav suggested, it can only show—indeed, only possess—its quality in congenial presence—according to the amount and condition of the iron or steel in its presence. Again, it may be so weak in the quality of magnetism as to produce no perceptible effect in that line, even in the most congenial presence, yet capable of forming a poker at five cents a pound, or hairsprings for watches at a fortune, in presence congenial to that end.

But whatever it does, or is done with it, is the inevitable soap of self and circumstances.

So in the case of every man. Had the lye been stronger or weaker, or more or less, or the other conditions ditto, the soap would hav been more or less, or better or worse, accordingly; always accordingly.

For further illustration consider any disease. For convenience, and as recollections are fresh concerning it, let the disease be yellow fever. B. F. Butler has recently produced many facts and strong arguments tending to prove that this disease is, at least on the one side, the fruit of two prominent conditions that must concur to start it, or produce the yeast or sponge of it; i.e., a filth or foulness generated by the concurrent decomposition of animal and vegetable matter. Assume, then, that these are two conditions, also that there are several others, among which is necessarily the subject or victim, and be in a receptiv condition—altogether, say there are ten conditions. Then, before a case of yellow fever can occur, there must be brought together all these conditions, and which, whenever together, will necessarily produce this fruit. And as these conditions are in force or slight, the disease must be severe or light.

I think I may safely guess there never was an instance where every person remaining at his post in a populous locality where this or any other disease prevailed was attacked by it. It is therefore fair to assume that all the conditions causing it hav never congregated in any locality. Hence more or less of the conditions must be in the victims; conditions which render them different from those who escape under the same exposure, just as those who are easily poisoned by ivy, or hav been vaccinated, etc., are different in some conditions from others.

I hav assumed that ten conditions are necessary. In one case may not most of these conditions be in the victim, while in another they are in the location, so that in one case the fever is virtually a spontaneous combustion; in another, substantially the work of an incendiary?

As corn cannot grow where the conditions are not right, but will grow and produce from a nominal to an enormous yield according to the fitness of conditions, so with health and disease—"belief and unbelief," Protestantism and Catholicism, Mormonism and paganism, democracy and republicanism, the fool and the sage, the rich and the poor, the saint and the sinner. Yea, verily, each and all things, in heaven or on earth, must be the inevitable fruit of the conditions that produce them; and those that produced these conditions, the fruit of others farther back, without end.

It therefore follows that if the health, thoughts, or actions of microbes, mice, or men are to be changed from their present bent, conditions must be changed. And how slight the change required to cause a revolution! How different is steel from iron! Yet it is iron precisely, with the mere trifle of one-tenth of one per cent to about one and one half per cent of carbon incorporated with it. It is the soap produced by the union of iron with this trifle. When pure, it is very good for its many purposes, but what a trifle of slag poisons it, as it were, and renders it worthless!

So man is poisoned, or side-tracked, with a trifle of strychnin in the stomach, venom in the blood, gas in the lungs, a little abnormal pressure on the brain from a blow upon the head, or from financial embarrassment, or other trouble, that produces the fruit of insanity, fatal fever, or unbearable despondency that culminates in suicide—which is just as natural and legitimate a child of conditions as death from consumption or old age.

It was but after many generations of men had come and gone that any process of manufacturing steel, or even iron, was discovered. A short time ago we had only the slow and expensiv puddling process, then a great improvement in the Bessemer process, and now we hav the Bookwalter process by which crude ore is cast into any desired grade of iron or steel, and even mixed as desired in the same bar or piece, and as cheaply as pig iron is made. In short, by this process I am informed that what may be cast from the crude ore in the line of iron or steel, is under complete, easy, and almost dirt-cheap control of the intelligent manipulator. Of course the same process would always hav produced the same results. And is it not the province of the educator, the moralist, and philanthropist to find the Bookwalter process of generating the best human ore, through attention to the hereditary law, and then of making the best results from each piece, according to its peculiarity?

Ah! but say you, "Now you hav your foot in it, for, according to your postulate, things, men, and gods hav done and can only do what they must; what then is the use of trying, or how can we try to improve or change matters?" I answer: These thoughts—postulates if you choose—are the soap of my personality united and assimilated with the grease of matters and things with which I hav come in contact. If they shall prove new to any, or even recall or reinforce any old thoughts, they may prove the one-tenth of one per cent of carbon lacking to make a trifle more of true steel in this generation, and far more when compounded, reverberated, and reinforced in generations to come.

But suppose this manuscript shall be rejected and burnt? Well, then it will hav produced some effect upon its author, also on the censor that condemns it. And it is part of the law of nature that every movement, everything said, done, or thought, produces some effect, and these effects other effects. Verily, like the pebble thrown in the sea, though it may raise but a little circle just about it, these little ones will in turn raise others farther back, and these still other wider and deeper ones, until finally every particle of the sea will not only hav been moved by it, but will ever after respond to it. So every man—every act, word, thought, motiv, or impulse of man—as also monkey or mouse, is the "heir of all the ages" (past), and will hav been parent and joint director of all the ages to come.

But, say my orthodox friends, if these ideas would hold water without an overruling providence, they certainly will not with. I ask, why not, how not, and whether such providence acts consistently according to fixed laws of its nature, or whimsically and by chance? Does the providence theory solve the mystery in the difference between Old Browny and her lazy companions, or the similar differences found among all the lower animals? If so, why should they not pray, or be prayed for? Does not the growing corn respond as it must through sunshine or frost, drouth or rain? Verily, what difference can it make in the premises, whether "man's goings are of the Lord" (Prov. xx, 24), in the paths of rectitude and peace, or in the ways of evil because of "strange delusions sent them by God that they should believe a lie that they might be damned" (2 Thes. ii, 11, 12)? In either case, and every case, are not man's goings, comings, and doings the necessary fruit of conditions?

And, if so, do any frightful corollaries follow? But what if there do? Shall we shun or deny facts because we fear them? Diseases are not cured, mistakes corrected, or evil consequences avoided by remaining in ignorance of, ignoring, denying, or misrepresenting facts, but by learning them, squarely confronting them, and especially by putting ourselvs in harmony with them. In the long run, falsehood or error about everything must do far more harm than the truth. We must finally endure the always painful ordeal of twilight and transition if we ever enjoy the full sunlight, though we put it off a thousand years.

Finally, then, is not the conclusion that we do as we must, an inevitable corollary of the familiar axiom: "Like produces like?" Even if so, let us not despair or despond. For if things are as they must be, they are frequently not as, nor so, bad as they seem. In 1861 our people quarreled over an election bet, as it were. In a comparativly inexpensiv ninety days skirmish, they would settle it! You know the rest. We duly mourn the dead, but do we duly appreciate the compensation—past and to come—in that it brought four millions that were dead in slavery, to life in freedom; and the end is not yet? For a season, the "well-to-do" will pass the ignorant, the weak, and the vicious by on the other side. But soon or late, by the smart from the friction—when the yeast of experience has duly raised the bread of reason—they will see superior safety, prosperity, and happiness in lending such a helping hand as will not only lift Lazarus up, but hold him up until he not only can, but will, stand alone. Then, also, the Lazaruses will see their best interest in carefully and faithfully carrying water to the rich men—their only source of employment or support; for, "from him that hath not, cannot be taken away that he hath."

The rich and the poor, the strong and the weak, are as magnets—and iron and steel for each other. If they regard and approach each other upon the harmonious plane of mutual aid, support, interest, and necessity, they will be attracted and drawn together; held fast in each other's regard; and prosperity, happiness, and safety will reign over and among them. But if they approach each other as by the negativ pole—if they meet upon the false and discordant plane of enmity and conflicting interest—there will be repulsion, discord, anarchy, and the farce of Æsop's dog and his bone, or the tragedy of the Kilkenny cats will be repeated. Yet, whatever comes will be, in due course, the inevitable fruit of combinations—causes.

True, if more or less steam were turned on, a better engin provided, a belt shifted, or pulley enlarged, or if there were a different grist to grind, or a different miller, the result would be different. But in these cases, as in all others, the fruit, the soap, would be precisely as it must according to conditions, and would be repeated as often as twice two would be four.

Is there nothing new under the sun? Nothing except the fruit of new combinations; but from these are all things new every day. It is a common faith that we could easily act differently from what we do, if we would. Often this looks plausible on the surface. But every act impelled by mind, is the result of the will to do it, and the will to do or not to do, is the inevitable fruit of the conditions that bear it, and this fruit could not hav been varied without a change of those conditions.

At birth we are launched upon the stream of life with physical and mental equipments, and at times and places, about which we were not consulted; over which we had no control. Thence the stream bears us irresistibly forward to the end. Some are launched away up whence they hav a voyage of a hundred years; others, just at the mouth, and are borne into the ocean of death in a year; a month; a day. Some without talent—without strength of mind or muscle—float passivly to the end. A few are carried in contact with painted boats or gilded ships, which they hav strength of will and muscle to board and skill to manage. These hav a more or less prosperous and happy voyage, though the care is oft more than its profit. But only dug-outs, or drift-wood, come within reach of many; while more than a few are borne down by the current where there is never a straw to catch at, though their arms be as strong, hands as willing, eyes as watchful, and hearts as brave as those of any upon the gilded craft. But there is compensation; for much

Heresy To a Heresy.

The Darwinian theory of evolution seems to hav found favor with a majority of the scholars of our times, but this is no evidence of its truth. The majority may be on one side of a question, while the weight of evidence is on the other. Great reform movements are always led by minorities.

If evolution is true, why are men, even those who believe in it, still searching for the missing link, and thus impliedly admitting the lack of evidence necessary to sustain the theory they teach? Is not this fact alone enough to arouse suspicion that it is not a link only, but a whole chain of evidence, that is wanting? If his theories were correct, it would not be the learned scientist only that would be able to trace man's genealogy backward through the lower forms of animal life; the evidence of the amalgamation of the species proving man's relation to the lower animals, would be seen at every turn. Darwin points out this difficulty, for he candidly admits that there are difficulties in the way of his theories, and devotes a chapter in his "Origin of Species" to their discussion. He says: "Why, if species hav descended from other species by fine gradations, do we not everywhere see innumerable transitional forms? Why is not all nature in confusion, instead of the species being as we see them, well defined?" His answer is that extinction and natural selection go hand in hand, but his conclusions are drawn largely from inference; his arguments to sustain this theory are not at all clear.

Again he says: "By this theory innumerable transitional forms must hav existed. Why do we not find them imbedded in countless numbers in the crust of the earth?" His answer to this is, that it is on account of the imperfection of the geological record. So by his own admissions, the evidences sufficient to clearly establish his theories has been found neither on the earth nor in the earth.

Darwin did not find the truth: at least, he failed to discover evidence sufficient to justify his conclusions. Conclusiv testimony proving man's relation by blood or birth to the lower animals has never yet been discovered.

He admits one miracle, a special creation by God to start animal life. And what is this but an admission that he did not know the origin of life? How could he know of a creation without either having a special revelation from God, or being present at the occurrence?

Professor Haeckel, one of Darwin's greatest disciples, in his "History of Creation" rejects the idea of God and teaches that "the imperfect original beings came into existence not by supernatural creation, but by spontaneous generation out of inorganic matter." This disagreement between the leaders of evolution cast a shadow upon the theory at its outset. The school of scientists of which Professor Agassiz was considered the leader disagrees with Darwin. Spencer and Huxley differ: Spencer teaches a change from simple to complex forms; Huxley, the reverse. The author of "Vestiges of the Natural History of Creation," the publication of which so disturbed the Christian world, says, "It is still an open question whether mankind is of one or more origins." He, too, acknowledges a creator, and thus disagrees with Haeckel. All these facts tend to deepen the shadow under which Darwin's theories rest.

The arguments of Darwin and those of his coadjutors hav been hopelessly shattered, completely overthrown, by A. Wilford Hall in his remarkable book, "The Problem of Human Life Here and Hereafter," and so far as I am informed, none of the noted scientists that believe in evolution hav attempted to answer Mr. Hall, although invited and urged by him to do so, but instead they chose to maintain a discreet silence in regard to his book, as he predicted they would do. His arguments against evolution are as clear, as crushing and unanswerable, as the arguments of Paine against the Bible. Although he proved his ability to refute the Darwinian theory, he produced no evidence of man's origin, other than the story of creation in Genesis, but seemed to think that to break down evolution was to support victoriously God and the Bible. He assumes the miraculous creation of all specific forms as the only consistent hypothesis of the origin of species.

If Darwin's theory of natural selection, or survival of the fittest, were true, there should be no lower animals in existence; each species should hav passed away upon the appearance of its successor, until upon the appearance of man, he being the fittest, all lower animal life should hav become utterly extinct. Yet Professor Haeckel tells us that even the moneron, from which, as he affirms, all animal life originated, is still in existence, and as numerous as ever. So we see that by the testimony of Darwin's greatest disciple, and of Darwin himself, extinction and natural selection do not go hand in hand. Darwin says: "As soon as a species becomes changed in structure by natural selection, the improved descendants must inevitably exterminate the parent form and take its place." Again: "New and improved varieties will inevitably supplant and exterminate the older." Thus, says Hall, "this self-stultifying principle of evolution under natural selection involves the necessity that man should now be the only living species on this earth, since every form below him through which his line of descent has progressed would hav successivly and inevitably succumbed and been exterminated as soon as each improved form made its appearance."

Again: "An unanswerable proof that species were separate creations and not the work of evolution, is that nature has drawn the line between them; they cannot hybridize and produce new species." "The direct tendency of every abnormal form in species is to revert to the normal type, which is the exact opposit of evolution, and flat contradiction of the possibility of transmutation: it contradicts the fundamental principle of evolution and absolutely overthrows the system."

Darwin says: "Natural selection cannot produce an organ of any kind; it can only cultivate them after they exist and are useful." Then how did the first bird's wings come? Incipient wings are not useful. Hall in reviewing this point says: "Natural selection could hav done nothing toward developing the first pair of perfect wings, as it can only act on useful and beneficial organs." Again he says: "Any ordinary student might undertake to break down evolution fifty times a day for a week using Darwin's books."

Because there are similarities existing between man and the lower animals, it is in itself no evidence of a common origin. Yet evolution is based upon alleged points of resemblance, many of which are so ambiguous, so unsatisfactory, that they are deemed unworthy of consideration by all except believers in the theory. Like Christian evidences, they prove upon examination to be no evidence at all.

There is an evolution in the sense of progress, unfolding, but as to the origin of species, of life, or of matter, we are as much as ever in doubt and ignorance. The Darwinian theory of evolution has been demolished. The story of creation in Genesis is unworthy of the serious consideration of learned men. The traces of the origin of man and of animals are probably so obscured by the lapse of time that our curiosity, our longing for a knowledge of the truth as to the beginning, may never be satisfied.

If this article should induce anyone, who has not done so, to read Mr. Hall's book, and compare his arguments with the arguments found in the principal works on evolution, its principal object will hav been accomplished. LEMUEL J. POTTS.

Things All Over the Country.

Preparations for the Cronin memorial meeting at Central Music Hall June 28th are being conducted on an extensiv scale. Representativs of all nationalities will participate. The list of vice-presidents now being made up will include several hundred of Chicago's leading citizens. The following hav agreed to make speeches: President W. H. Dyrenforth of the Personal Rights League, who will introduce Mayor Cregier; C. G. Dixon, the Rev. Father Higgins, the Hon. Frank Lawler, Robert Lindblom, Dr. G. Frank Lydston, Louis Nettleborst, E. A. Stevens, and Congressman Abner Taylor. The music will be furnished by several German singing societies. Admission will be by complimentary tickets.—Chicago Times.

It gave me somewhat of a shock on Sunday to read the above item in all the papers and find myself sandwiched for a speech between a Jesuit father and a millionaire Congressman. I wondered what mean thing I had done that I should be considered capable of speaking suitably to the occasion and the company, more especially as I had been selected for such a questionable honor without consultation. In the evening, Chas. Bary, Esq., editor of the Personal Rights Advocate, and national secretary of the Personal Rights League, gave the Secular Union a most excellent lecture on the purposes of his organization, and during the evening he personally explained that the committee desired the representativs of the widest possible diversity of thought, nationality, and creed to express their feelings on this occasion. They succeeded admirably in their antithetical research, but I am inclined to believe it best for me to say nothing.

GIVING HIM A DAKOTA BLIZZARD.

The "Wooly West" is raising quite a breeze over Brother Wanamaker's pious Sabbatarian fads in the postal service which close the mails for frontiermen on Sundays. Some Senators, we learn, are being overwhelmed with protests, and every mail is adding to the number.

The Sunday mail service has been the greatest national boon the people of far-off Dakota and Montana enjoyed, and they think so much of their mails and so little of Wanamaker's enforced piety that his attempts to shut them off are liable to hav a fatal effect on his party, as they will soon vote as states. This distinguished Sunday-school superintendent at the head of the United States mails has directed that all contracts for mail service over the Star routes shall be advertised on the basis of six days' service only. In cases where they hav inadvertently called for seven days' service, he has ordered a re-advertising, but this obtrusiv piety is raising such a storm of disapproval that the administration will either hav to down him or he will down the administration.

THE REIGN OF KING JESUS POSTPONED.

Whatever the diversity of opinion among Liberals relativ to the use or abuse of alcoholic stimulants, the vast proportion will rejoice at the signal defeat which Prohibition has met in several states, especially in Pennsylvania, where they declared that the adoption of Prohibition meant "the reign of King Jesus." The republic will be preserved a little while longer, it seems.

POINTS ON THE CRONIN CASE.

Two or three weeks ago I spoke of Father Dorney's possible connection with the Clan-na-Gael, and suggested his complicity in covering up frauds on the funds raised by that organization; saying he had been the virtual leader of the district some years ago, and was always the right bower of Alexander Sullivan, the supposed arch-conspirator in this dastardly plot. The city papers at that time were very busy coddling Catholicism, so much so that not even a mild article would they publish referring to the Bruno monument, but now like weathercocks they are willing to go with the wind, and already Camp No. 52 of the Clan-na-Gael has drawn up a petition to the archbishop, demanding the dismissal of this clerical misfit from their parish. This demand is made because of this very reverend father's conniving at fraud to screen Sullivan, and also his denial that he ever belonged to the order. On the strength of a malicious letter this priestly perjurer had a certain W. P. Dunne expelled and branded as a traitor. Mr. Dunne says of Father Dorney:

I believe that next to Alexander Sullivan no man in America is so much to blame to-day as Father Dorney for the unfortunate condition of affairs in Irish organizations, and I hold him morally responsible for the blood of poor Cronin, for had he acted the part of an honest man the patriotic Irish people would not hav been robbed, and the pure patriot and true Irishman, Dr. Cronin, would not hav been murdered.

That he (Dorney) is a most consummate hypocrit is illustrated by an Irishman who was present at the reunion of Camp No. 96, when Father Dorney was there, and who, when asked some uncomfortable questions, said he had forgotten to read his priestly office before coming, and thereupon proceeded to attend to it then and there, the senior Guardian sarcastically remarking, "Brother ——— will please pass the hat and take up a collection while Brother Dorney is praying." It is intimated the archbishop considers this request rather "cheeky" for a secret society to make, fearing that the Clan wants to "run the religion of Chicago." As the "religion of Chicago" has heretofore run its police force, fire department, and politics through the Clan-na-Gael, we cannot see how Pat Feehan can well object to their taking a turn at the religious racket. If Dorney does not "move on" he may be "removed," which is the Irish for catch-basin candidates for a corpse. "Like priest, like people."

Another instance of how THE TRUTH SEEKER leads the van on news and coincidences, is the fact that I pointed out ten days ago the singular fact that the Cronin murder was perpetrated May 4, 1889, the Haymarket bomb was thrown May 4, 1886, and the murder of Lord Cavendish in Phenix park was on May 4, 1882. Our Chicago press men hav just "caught on." A further similarity is that the Cronin and Cavendish murders were both perpetrated on Saturday night.

This excellent advice of a particular friend is too good to be lost:

Will the Irish of America
Be kind enough to take
A little bit of good advice
Compounded for their sake?
Then let the Irish who remain
In Ireland fight their fight.
To send them moral aid and cash
Of course is only right.
But let them not embroil the land
That shelters them in war,
And let them not attempt to wade
Into each other's gore,
Nor fight their battles in the sewers
Or cesspools any more.
The Irish should each other love
And learn to liv in peace,
If not we'll hav to look elsewhere
For firemen and police.

A MIRACLE MONGER.

Father Mollinger, of Pittsburgh, I see, has had his annual innings at faith cure on St. Anthony's day, and at 6 A.M. the church on Troy Hill was crowded with thousands of the lame, the blind, and the halt, and by noon it was impossible to pass along the streets in front of the church, lined as they were with cripples and diseased persons. The reverend faith cure performer refuses to treat anyone lacking faith in him, and as a matter of course, the cures said to be effected are as great as his patients' credulity. What a comment on our boasted nineteenth century civilization!

ADROIT HORTON.

The Northwestern University is a Methodist educational mill, which has just elected Professor Swing as one of its trustees. The proposition was first made that he fill the vacancy caused by the death of Judge Grant Gooderich, of pious memory; but it raised as much of a howl as a fight in a political convention. One old preacher from Missouri frantically exclaimed: "The eye of entire Methodism is upon us. Our people will be shocked if this thing occurs. Woe to us if we do so rash a thing." Some of his hearers were impressed and said, "Amen." A man from Michigan was also opposed to the nomination; he thought the friends of the University should put none but Methodists on guard. Others objected to his filling the vacancy of so devout a Methodist; so, to whip the devil around the stump, the inspired man of subterfuges, Judge Horton, tendered his resignation, and Professor Swing was elected to fill that vacancy, and Horton was elected to fill Judge Gooderich's place. What fine distinctions these sectarians observe!

Swing was assailed as an avowed Infidel; but the Infidels would be the most anxious to repudiate him of any class in this community, for, whatever moral courage he may hav possessed when charged with heresy to Calvinism, he seems to hav got bravely over it by talking soft platitudes and delivering exquisit and learned exordiums to a set of plethoric pocketbooks—pork packers who simply smiled at each other as though they understood what he said. Still, outside of his "set," it seems that the cry of heresy still clings to him, while Chicago people long ago relegated him among the more orthodox. It only shows that bigotry is dying hard when the most radical thing I can remember ever being attributed to Swing was his remark that "Penelope and Socrates would jostle Martha and Paul in the realms of paradise." Pueril Questioning, Reasoning, and Objecting.

MR. PRIESTLEY: Just one year ago my article, "Sense and Spiritualism," appeared in these columns, and you are well aware of the storm it created. I had prepared it carefully, and felt well assured that I could sustain every proposition it contained.

Although you hav declined meeting me, and declared that a discussion between us would be worse than useless, still, I assume the right of the attacked party, to the firing of the last gun. Hence this letter.

I should hav answered yours sooner, but was waiting to hear from some more of the "impossibles," but as they seem also to hav declined I will content myself mainly with trying to show you the pith of the heading to this letter.

You say you "hav no expectation or desire of proving a negativ respecting the existence of ghosts, etc." Well, what else hav you been attempting when you boldly declare that what is known as the Spiritual phenomenon is an impossibility?

I felt when you used that term you did so unthinkingly, for no man of your mental caliber can, with due respect for himself, use the term "impossible" outside of pure mathematics.

It is an assumption of a position which you rightly and forcibly refuse even to the God of the Christian. It belongs solely to the realm of so-called omniscience, and it is needless to remind you that, from a human standpoint, omniscience and idiocy are synonymous.

But the difficulty with many men is that if they cannot comprehend a proposition, they hasten at once to condemn, and declare it "impossible." If in material science the investigator was also a swift-witness, I fear much that many of our discoveries would still be hidden in the womb of Mother Nature. Patient investigation, and that alone, can hope for success. The chemist, no matter what he may be experimenting on, does not nail over the door of his laboratory the word "impossible." Too many condemn without giving the matter sufficient examination, but the majority are too indolent to investigate for themselvs. They wait till it is an accepted fact, and then they assure the world that they always knew it.

A few years ago I boarded with a family which numbered among its members an "impossible" Materialist.

One evening at the supper-table this gentleman, who, by the way, was an electrician, announced that he knew of his own knowledge that Spiritualism was a fraud, and its supporters, a parcel of fools. He had investigated it and could prove, beyond the peradventure of a doubt, that all the phenomena were due to electrical forces.

Now, this was the very man I had been looking after for many years, and I hastened to assure him that I was seeking knowledge in his direction. I asked him what "séances" he had attended and, to my surprise, he did not know the meaning of the term.

I questioned him pretty closely, and his experience amounted to the hearing of a single lecture delivered by Mrs. Hyser in Baltimore. On this lecture he had built up his theory which was as clear as the boy's description of the working of an engin: "The man has something to hold water in, and then he builds a fire under it, and when the water boils the steam moves a jim-crack and that turns the wheels, and then the boat starts."

Now, Friend Priestley, don't you occupy a position similar to this electrician when you say, "If we take in all that can be clearly substantiated by unimpeachable testimony, we shall land in the asylum; if we begin to reject what is unreasonable, improbable, contradictory, impossible, and absurd, we come ultimately to reject the whole."

Read the above over carefully and I feel to say that you will wish you had not written it. Can anything be more absurd than "unimpeachable testimony" of anything that is "improbable, contradictory, impossible, and absurd?"

I positivly deny that, "the proof of the existence of spirits depends on the occurrence of what are called phenomena" (physical).

There are millions of honest people who are able to demonstrate to their own satisfaction the existence of a spiritual world, without the assistance of anyone. You meet some of them every day, and their testimony, satisfactory to themselvs at least, should receive the benefit of all doubts, till disproved.

You may, if you please, place yourself on record as denying the possibility of slatewriting, but, in view of my article, with the attesting witnesses, I fear you will find yourself in the minority.

You cannot hope to combat a "fact" with a simple denial, for it favors the child's reason, "Because." A something is beyond a child's reasoning power—he denies it, and givs as his reason, "Because."

Now, I was challenged to produce evidence of this slatewriting. I did so. The witnesses are respectable and trustworthy. I looked for a crushing blow from my challengers, and one puns on the word "slate," another delicately hints that I lie, a third deplores my "falling from grace," and you criticise without having read the article.

You ask, "Why hav two slates?" and insinuate that a fraud was consummated because of the two slates, and then ignore the fact that at another part of the sitting only one slate was used, and that one was placed on Mr. Macdonald's head.

But you will pardon my saying that the meanest part of your letter is where you say, "That I [you] can not explain Slade's tricks, does not prove that he is not a trickster."

Is this an honest criticism, from an honest, high-minded, honorable man? Does Mr. Priestley desire to hav the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER understand that he is willing to brand, as a knave, a man concerning whom he knows nothing, save that he is a Spiritual medium?

Is this all that Freethought and Infidelity hav taught Mr. Priestley?

Had the Brooklyn hippodromist written it, I should hav passed it in silence; but I had looked for other and better thoughts from Mr. Priestley.

The next time I meet Slade I will offer him your apology.

You next claim that because you hav gained no information from reading Spiritual literature, you feel convinced this forms another link in the chain connecting it with "other forms of superstition."

There is nothing I hav ever met in the Spiritual teachings which is not moral in its tendencies and which cannot be made applicable to our daily lives.

Our philosophy was the first one to deal a death-blow to "vicarious atonement," hence the antipathy of the church.

It teaches the brotherhood of man and the equality of women.

And in the Abolition movement which culminated in removing the stain and disgrace of slavery from our bright escutcheon, the most prominent members had received their light and were under the guidance of the Spiritual philosophy. The church sneered at them, and the terms Abolitionist and Spiritualist became practically synonymous. And, let me add, ninety per cent of my Materialistic friends favored slavery, and I challenge the production of one Spiritualist, even Southern born, who did not favor emancipation.

It pointed out, before the time of Darwin, the theory of evolution, and proves, beyond the peradventure of a doubt, that the laws of nature are changeless and the destiny of man is upward and onward.

It instructs us in the law of heredity, the only salvation for humanity.

It shows us how to communicate with our loved dead, and, above all, it deprives death of its sting. Yes, death, at the very name of which the stoutest Christian or Materialist heart quails in terror.

For the Spiritualist death has no terrors. He understands it to be simply a chemical change which parts the thin veil hiding the faces of the loved ones who hav gone on before.

In the words of John Pierpont, speaking from the shores of the immortal world, "the work of Spiritualism is as broad as the universe. It extends from the highest spheres of angelic life to the lowest conditions of human ignorance. It is as broad as wisdom, as comprehensiv as love, and its mission is to bless mankind."

And yet you would hav me believe that you hav read our literature without receiving one crumb of comfort, one ray of light.

I can't believe it, else you are constituted differently from the rest of mankind.

It may appear to you to savor of superstition to hav it proved that your loved and lost still liv. To me it is a comfort.

It may appear ridiculous to you to hear that they still love you. To me it is the chief blessing in life. Had I not these, I should long for annihilation.

But let us turn to the phenomenal side, which you claim never has withstood scientific investigation.

Of course, when you make this statement, you are "up" in all the details. You do not refer to the experiments of Hare, Owens, and Buchanan in this country; of Zoellner and associates in Germany; of Wallace, Crookes, Varley, and others in England; or, in short, of a variety held in every country under the sun during the past years, but you refer to the latest two. Well, let us examin them.

There was a man named Seybert, who, notwithstanding his being "aberrant," managed to amass a large fortune, and feeling that mayhap he might be correct in some of his surmises in regard to a future life, desired to benefit humanity by having them honestly investigated. So he left some $70,000 for that purpose, and stipulated that the investigation should be purely scientific, and that his nativ city, Philadelphia, should be the seat of the inquiry.

Now, the Philadelphian is especially noted for two things: his knowledge of pants and familiarity with scientific subjects. So, when not engaged assisting Brother Wanamaker in making pants or sending circulars about them to the postmasters throughout the country, he, of necessity, turns to his other favorit employment. And it is a well-known fact that, if one desire to make a scientific Philadelphian happy, he has only to invite him to take the leading part in a scientific discussion.

But it was difficult to select from such a vast number of scientists—in fact, a whole city—a committee small enough to carry out Seybert's wishes, and after much consideration the matter was placed in the hands of one Heater, or some such name.

An imp by my side suggests that the name was Furniss. But, whether Heater or Furniss, Furniss or Heater, either, both, or neither, this eminent scientist, whose most prominent feature was a huge ear-trumpet, as he was as deaf as a post, undertook the task.

I remember meeting him several times in Boston, and his queries would hav put to blush even an "impossible" Materialist. But he had gone to the Hub to gather points, and having satisfied himself as to the proper mode of procedure, he returned to the City of Brotherly Love fully cocked and primed.

Mediums were summoned, and under Heater Furniss's own conditions, as he admits, the various phases of the phenomena took place. But H. F., being a scientist, was not satisfied.

His scientific questionings were the wonder and amazement of his colleagues. Many a poor medium trembled in his boots when unable to giv a satisfactory reason for an unknown cause.

> And still the wonder grew,
> How one small head could carry all he knew.

Heater Furniss could see, to be sure; but he could not hear; and, as in the economy of nature a deficit in one part is usually compensated by a corresponding increase in some other part, he concluded that he was entitled to clairvoyance at least.

So every day, at a stated hour, he hied away to a secure retreat, where, seated in the dark for an hour, with his head wrapped in wet cloths, he scientifically investigated the claims of clairvoyance.

He failed to see a single ghost. Whether the cloths were too damp, or not damp enough, I know not. Unfriendly critics say that the evaporation was internal. But he failed; made an adverse report, and in consequence Spiritualism is damned in Philadelphia. Yes, scientifically damned, and the remnant of Seybert's bequest may, in the near future, enrich some Christian institution.

Now, had Furniss Heater used whisky he might at least hav seen snakes, and that would hav repaid him for his trouble. So I hope that when the next scientific Philadelphian undertakes the task he will eschew water entirely and stick to whisky, or at least beer. That will giv the phenomenon a living chance.

The other scientific investigation you refer to was held by the Psychical Research Society of England. Well, this society felt it incumbent upon them to investigate. They had been formed for that purpose, and, as to a true scientist original methods count for much, all Spiritualists were rigidly excluded from participation. This also prevented any possible charge of bias.

Mediums were summoned, and in the presence of one in particular the raps were so pronounced that it behooved the society to investigate that medium in particular.

Stand him where they would, even on insulators, raps were given in all parts of the room, answering mental questions, and giving the names of parties long deceased.

After many weeks of this the fact, as a fact, was duly announced, and it was declared that theories, to account for this fact, were now in order.

Beecher's toe-joint theory would not answer, for it had been submerged with his moral character. But there was one little unpretending fellow, a true scientist, who had recently been reading a treatis on the "Circulation of the Blood," and the theory was so novel, he asserted and stuck to it that the raps were produced by the blood circulating in the arm of the medium.

This looked very plausible, and although it did not account for the answering of mental questions, yet it was a step in the right direction, and don't ye know a fellow can't find out everything at once.

So the medium was requested to submit to an operation, extracting all the blood from his arm, and it was announced that if the raps still continued the society would investigate the medium's brain to determin what effect it had upon the mental part of the program.

Now, unfortunately for science, the medium was not only a married man with several children, but also was very obstinate. Although he desired his mediumship proved, he could not be made to see the propriety of his losing a quart or so of blood.

He was reasoned with, cajoled, threatened; all to no purpose. He argued that the little scientist was entitled to the place of honor as the first discoverer, but the L. S. declined.

The society then feeling it had performed its duty, unanimously declared the medium a fraud, and that because they "could not explain his tricks that did not prove he was not a trickster."

The report was published, duly arrived in this country, and is now, as it should be, used by the church as a proof that the phenomena cannot bear scientific investigation.

The church, Mr. Priestley, is your greatest and best ally. Believe me, she will forget for the nonce your Materialism if you will only join in her vain attempt to squelch Spiritualism.

Now, I do not desire to be understood as saying that the phenomena should not be investigated, nor that any man in his investigations is not entitled to carry out his own views. But I do most decidedly say that if there be a law governing any proposed investigation, that law should be respected. Moreover, if a man will not conform to that law, that he is not entitled to criticise.

The law, as I understand it, is simply harmony, and surely anyone can conform himself to it without loss of individuality.

The shrewdest, closest, most critical investigators I hav ever met were Spiritualists of thirty or more years. Their experience was large, and they utilized it.

If you hav prejudices, they should be stamped out, and I claim here, and if you will giv the matter the slightest thought you will see I am correct, that to scientifically and impartially investigate you must place yourself among the investigators; take your stand according to your true knowledge, and not arrogate to yourself an untenable position by attempting the role of student and teacher at one and the same time.

From a man who knows nothing of the matter it comes in bad grace, a declaration that a law is unnecessary, pueril, ridiculous, or what not.

An investigator, as I understand the term, is a student; one examining a subject. But if you are omniscient, if you can tell in advance that it is "impossible," you are not a student, but a judge.

Hence I claim you never investigated.

No doubt you hav noticed the many silly objections raised by some parties, and the worse than silly questions propounded by others, and all of them asked with such a cool assumption that it is positivly refreshing to re-read them this warm weather.

"If spirits do not possess a physical or material body, it is absolutely certain that they cannot possess the organs of speech," writes one.

After citing much in regard to witchcraft, another adds his mite, thus: "The overwhelming testimony in favor of modern Spiritualism is, in like manner, the effect of prepossession." Now if this critic had asked himself the question, What is prepossession? he never would hav made the admission. He is a good Catholic, and there are plenty of St. Jameses before him.

Another says, "McArthur no doubt is sincere in his belief, but he is off, terribly off, when he tries to show Mrs. Slenker physically what he claims to hav spiritually." Bless Johnson's dear old soul, but he is very far from being "terribly on." I never made any such claims and never made any such attempts.

I simply stated that the phenomena were facts, and proved them to be such.

But the worst of all—if it be possible to make a distinction—comes from Mrs. Slenker.

In the issue of Dec. 15, 1888, the lady, in a labored and scientific argument, remarks: "It is still a disputed point among scientists as to whether a person can see from the back of the head or pit of the stomach," and adds to it a little advice in regard to Dr. Hollick and his "Nerves and the Nervous," advising his readers to buy the book, as thereby they may obtain valuable points in regard to the true origin of the Spiritual phenomena.

And Dr. Hollick, she assures them, still livs.

I hav given Mrs. Slenker's scientific theory considerable thought, and remember having seen men whose eyes were built on the plan of the Irishman's gun—which could shoot around a corner. But they were exceptions, and as a rule I find that their eyes are situated on either side of the nose.

So, I am at a loss to account for her statement, unless it be an indorsement of St. Augustine.

If I remember correctly, this saint assures us in his twenty-first lecture that, while bishop of Hippo, he once preached to a nation who had only one eye, and that situated in the breast.

Now, to save space and argument, I am willing to admit that this tribe of Augustinians settled somewhere in the vicinity of Snowville, Va., and that Mrs. Slenker and her scientific friends refer to them; and also, for the sake of peace, I will add that I am pleased to hear that the doctor is still alive.

Moreover, as a further peace-offering, I will say that, having re-read most of Mrs. Slenker's reports, I am willing to admit, and, if necessary, prepared to defend, that when Mrs. Slenker was pursuing her investigation of the Spiritual phenomena, her eyes were in her boots.

So, as peace reigns supreme; the warm weather on us, and none of the "impossibles" seem willing to come to the fore, let us close the discussion for the present.

I am going a-fishing, and I feel that, no matter how much ill luck you may wish me as a Spiritualist, I hope, Friend Priestley, that I may hav your best wishes in my endeavors to ensnare the finny tribe.

The Predictions Concerning the Coming of Christ.

Many claims hav been made that the old prophets predicted the coming of Jesus, and following are some of the principal predictions quoted.

"And the Lord God said unto the serpent, I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between her seed and thy seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel" (Gen. iii, 15). If there is anything in the Bible wherein it has been shown that the serpent's head was ever bruised by Jesus it has escaped our observation and research.

Admitting, for the purpose, that the serpent of Genesis iii was the devil or Satan represented in Rev. xii, 9; xx, 2, it certainly does not appear that the head of his satanic majesty was ever thus bruised; and even admitting all the peculiar interpretations usually given, there seems to be absolutely nothing historically sustaining such an event as having happened. But according to all ordinary interpretations the death of Jesus would appear to be a much greater triumph over the seed of the woman, than any triumph recorded over the seed of the serpent.

Even by interpreting the wicked (Matt. xiii, 38) to be the children of the devil (which we do not admit, for those called good and those called wicked are all of the same seed), yet no great bruising has happened to them, any more than to those who claim to be the seed of the woman, or the good. Church historians would lead us to believe that the children of God hav generally been the greatest sufferers.

If the crucifixion of Jesus was a victory over Satan, there are not many who are ambitious to achieve such victories.

In the year A.D. 60 one of the chief apostles did not understand that this bruising had then been done, for Paul says, "And the God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly" (Rom. xvi, 20), which shows that he, at least, was still looking for the fulfilment of the promis.

Passing by many minor passages which are often referred to as predictions concerning the coming of Christ, but which can only be so construed by implication, we come to the following, which is usually quoted as definitly predicting the birth of Jesus as the son of a virgin: "Behold a virgin shall conceive, and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel" (Isa. vii, 14).

Let us look at the history of this prediction. By a careful study of the whole chapter it will be seen that Rezin, king of Syria, and Pekah, king of Israel, had decided to make war against Ahaz, king of Judah, and Isaiah was sent to comfort Ahaz concerning the matter, and to predict the desolation of Syria and Samaria by the king of Assyria. As a sign of the fulfilment of this prediction, the words quoted were uttered and the following added: "Butter and honey shall he eat, that he may know to refuse the evil and choose the good. For before the child shall know to refuse the evil and choose the good, the land which thou abhorrest shall be forsaken of both her kings" (Isa. vii, 15, 16).

Referring to the eighth chapter we read: "And I took me faithful witnesses to record, Uriah the priest, and Zachariah the son of Jeberechiah. And I went unto the prophets, and she conceived and bare a son. Then said the Lord to me, Call his name Maher-shalal-hash-baz. For before the child shall hav knowledge to cry, my father, and my mother, the riches of Damascus, and the spoil of Samaria shall be taken away before the king of Assyria" (Isa. viii, 2–4).

This prediction is credited with having been uttered in the year 742 B.C., and by turning to 2 Kings xvi, 5–9, it will be seen that the promised event happened in the year 740 B.C.

This prediction is followed by another passage, which is quoted with as much confidence as is the former, as a prediction of the birth of Jesus: "For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given, and the government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counselor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace. Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice from henceforth even forever. The zeal of the Lord of hosts will perform this" (Isa. ix, 6, 7).

It is only necessary to read the two verses together to see how very unjust it is to assert that it is a prediction concerning the humble Nazarene. He was to be called the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father. Jesus is usually called the Son of God. Was he his own father? Verse 7 shows that it was but a flight of fancy of Isaiah's concerning the child born of the prophetess of chapter viii. It was a rhapsody over the birth of that child. But neither by that child, nor by Jesus, nor by any other person hav the predictions been fulfilled.

To his government and peace there was to be no end—upon the throne of David and his kingdom to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice, from henceforth even forever.

When, and by whom, was this done? In about one hundred and fifty-two years after this prediction the throne of David was thrown down and the people of Judah were carried into captivity. And but a few years after the time of Jesus the Jews were driven from Judah and scattered upon the face of the earth—just the opposit result from that which was foretold. Is, then, Jewish history a verification of this prediction, whether it referred to Jesus, the son born of the prophetess, or any other person? None of these predictions hav been fulfilled, only that referring to the destruction of Syria and Samaria by the king of Assyria.

The predictions contained in Isaiah xi hav none of them been fulfilled, though they are usually thought related to Jesus. This is one of the references to the branch growing out of the root of Jesse. Another passage referring to a branch is the following: "Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous branch, and a king shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. And in his days Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely; and this is his name whereby he shall be called, the Lord Our Righteousness. Therefore, behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that they shall no more say, The Lord liveth, which brought up the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt. But the Lord liveth which brought up and which led the seed of the house of Israel out of the north country, and from all countries whither I had driven them, and they shall dwell in their own land" (Jer. xxiii, 5–9).

This language is repeated in Jer. xxxiii, with the further assurance that "David shall never want a man to sit upon the throne of the house of Israel; neither shall the priests the Levites want a man before me to offer burnt-offerings, and to kindle meat-offerings and to do sacrifice continually" (verses 17, 18).

Not one of the conditions accompanying the predicted appearance of the "branch" has ever existed to the present day.

But it is certain that the branch was not Jesus, but another, for Zechariah says: "And the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, Take silver and gold and make crowns, and set them upon the head of Joshua the son of Josedech, the high priest; and speak unto him, saying, Thus speaketh the Lord of hosts, saying, Behold the man, whose name is the branch: and he shall grow up out of his place, and he shall build the temple of the Lord: even he shall build the temple of the Lord; and he shall bear the glory, and shall sit and rule upon his throne; and he shall be a priest upon his throne: and the counsel of peace shall be between them both" (Zech. vi, 9, 11–13).

What claim, then, can any person conscientiously make that these references to the branch were predictions concerning Jesus the son of Mary? How can men calling themselvs theologians—ministers of Christ, servants of God—guides to the people to lead them to God—dare to persist in making such claims?

The prediction of Zechariah that Joshua should build the temple seems to be about the only part of all these prophecies that was fulfilled. See Ezra v.

Christians claim that even the birthplace of Jesus the Christ was predicted, and quote the following: "But thou, Bethlehem Ephratah, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah, yet out of thee shall he come forth unto me that is to be ruler in Israel; whose goings forth hav been from of old, from everlasting" (Micah v, 2).

The next verse is not usually quoted, but we will introduce it here and consider them both together: "Therefore will he giv them up, until the time that she which travaileth hath brought forth: then the remnant of his brethren shall return unto the children of Israel" (verse 3).

If these passages predicted the place of birth of the Christ, then the life of Christ should conform to the conditions accompanying the prediction.

The person referred to in this prediction, who was to be born in Bethlehem, was to be "ruler in Israel," and at that time "the remnant of his brethren" were to "return unto the children of Israel."

When was Jesus the son of Mary a ruler in Israel? When did his brethren return to the children of Israel? Or are these events yet to happen in the future—always in the future, always to happen, but never happening?

The mere coincidence of Bethlehem being the birthplace of Jesus is not sufficient. It was the birthplace of many other children besides Jesus. Then, unless the conditions accompanying the prediction are shown to hav attended the man Jesus, why single him out from among the many as being the one referred to?

According to Matthew, when Herod inquired where Christ was to be born, the chief priests and scribes are said to hav answered: "In Bethlehem of Judea: for thus it is written by the prophet, And thou Bethlehem, in the land of Juda, art not the least among the princes of Juda: for out of thee shall come a governor, that shall rule my people Israel" (Matt. ii 5, 6).

Was Jesus the son of Mary ever a governor to rule Israel?

The subject of the prediction was not only to be a governor or ruler, but in his time, that is to say, then, the remnant was to return to Israel. Neither of these conditions was fulfilled in the man Jesus.

Matthew's claim that the birth of Jesus in Bethlehem was connected with this prophecy, does not prove it as a fact, for he also says in speaking of the birth of Jesus as the son of a virgin: "That it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet, saying, Behold, a virgin shall be with child, and shall bring forth a son, and they shall call his name Emmanuel; which being interpreted, is, God with us" (Matt. i, 22, 23).

Whilst it has already been shown that Isaiah's prediction had no reference to the birth of Jesus, but was fulfilled in the birth of Maher-shalal-hash-baz, and that the conditions or events attending his birth, namely, the desolation of Syria and Samaria by the king of Assyria, were accomplished.

If it be objected that Maher-shalal-hash-baz was not Immanuel, the same answer can be given that the name Jesus was not Immanuel. The former is interpreted "Savior," the latter "God with us."

Another prediction usually ascribed to Jesus is: "Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion! Shout, O daughter of Jerusalem! Behold, thy king cometh unto thee; he is just and having salvation; lowly, and riding upon an ass, and upon a colt the foal of an ass. And I will cut off the chariot from Ephraim, and the horse from Jerusalem, and the battle bow shall be cut off, and he shall speak peace unto the heathen; and his dominion shall be from sea to sea, and from the river even to the ends of the earth" (Zech. ix, 9, 10).

Usually only the first of these two verses is quoted by those who apply it to Jesus. It is considered to be a strong passage on account of its reference to the subject of the prediction coming riding upon an ass, and a colt the foal of an ass. And according to Luke xix this was the way in which Jesus made his triumphal entry into Jerusalem, the coincidence being very strong. The subject of this prediction is described as a king. If Jesus were a king then is every man a king. Again, he was to speak peace unto the heathen. But Jesus said of himself: "Think not that I am come to send peace on earth. I came not to send peace, but a sword. For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law. And a man's foes shall be they of his own household" (Matt. x, 34–36).

"But he (Jesus) answered and said: I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Matt. xv, 24).

This testimony of Jesus concerning himself disposes of that part of the prediction, and his history, written by his friends, shows that he never held dominion from sea to sea, nor from the river to the ends of the earth. So this description of Zechariah does not describe Jesus, even though the "king" was to come riding upon an ass.

Another passage is: "The scepter shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be" (Gen. xlix, 10).

A writer on the "Leading Prophecies Regarding Messiah," published in 1839, claims that this prediction was literally fulfilled, and that Judah was not without a king till Jesus came, of course making Jesus to be Shiloh—that Herod the Great's being on the throne at the time of the birth of Jesus, fulfilled Jacob's prediction on the head of Judah. This seems to be stretching facts a long way. It is generally conceded that the kingdom of Judah ended when Zechariah was taken captiv 586 B.C., though in 106 B.C. Aristobolus the high priest assumed the title of king. In 63 B.C. Pompey conquered Jerusalem, and from that time Judea was subject to Rome and Herod was king under Roman domination. So the scepter had departed from Judah at least fifty-nine years before Jesus was born, as it had frequently departed before. At the date given as the time of the birth of Jesus Judah was a Roman province, Herod having been appointed king by the Roman senate 40 B.C.

So this prediction either did not refer to Jesus or failed in the accompanying conditions.

There yet remains the famous seventy weeks prophecy of Daniel: "Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people and upon the holy city, to finish the transgression, and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to br ng in everlasting righteousness, and to seal up the vision and prophecy, and to anoint the most holy. Know, therefore, and understand, that from the going forth of the commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem, unto the messiah the prince, shall be seven weeks, and threescore and two weeks: the street shall be built again, and the wall, even in troublous times. And after threescore and two weeks shall messiah be cut off, but not for himself: and the people of the prince that shall come shall destroy the city and the sanctuary; and the end thereof shall be with a flood, and unto the end of the war desolations are determined. And he shall confirm the covenant with many for one week: and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease, and for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate, even until the consummation, and that determined, shall be poured upon the desolate" (Dan. ix, 24–27).

Avoiding for the present any argument as to the time when the seventy weeks should begin and consequently end, let us notice that the seventy weeks are determined upon the people and upon the holy city:—

1. To finish the transgression.
2. To make an end of sin.
3. To make reconciliation for iniquity.
4. To bring in everlasting righteousness.
5. To seal up the vision and prophecy.
6. To anoint the most holy.
7. That after threescore and two weeks messiah was to be cut off.
8. The people of the prince that shall come shall destroy the city and the sanctuary.
9. That the end thereof shall be with a flood.
10. The covenant to be confirmed with many for one week.
11. In the middle of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease.
12. He shall make it desolate until the consummation.

Which of these events or conditions was fulfilled by Jesus or the people of the prince that should come when he was cut off?

Has transgression ceased?

Hav no sins been committed since Jesus came?

When was reconciliation made for iniquity?

Has everlasting righteousness been brought in?

Were the vision and prophecy sealed up at the coming of Jesus or at his crucifixion?

History does not bear out any of these statements.

Our own observation teaches us that, unless it be the sealing up of the vision and prophecy, no one of the conditions exists to-day. Much less did they at the time of Jesus—that is, by giving the usual meaning to the words transgression, sins, iniquity, and righteousness.

The twenty-fourth verse seems to be intended to point to the time of the prospectiv millennium, which is still as prospectiv as it was then.

The Bible itself is against the fulfilment of these parts of the prediction, and definitly against the fifth subdivision, for it describes visions and prophecies long after any asserted time for the completion of the seventy weeks.

By turning to the Maccabees, which givs a history of the events foretold by Daniel, we learn that Antiochus Epiphanes having succeeded to the kingdom of Syria in the year 196 B.C., he confirmed the covenant by making Jason high priest, and afterward sold the same office to Menelaus for a greater sum than Jason had promised him. Menelaus failing to make his payment, he was deposed, and Lycimachus was made high priest in his place.

In the year 170 B.C. Antiochus took Jerusalem, sacked it, pillaged the temple, killed forty thousand and sold forty thousand of the inhabitants. In the year 168 B.C. he sent his collector of tribute into Judea with a great multitude, who despoiled Jerusalem and set it on fire, pulled down the houses and walls, and about 167 Antiochus issued a decree forbidding burnt-offerings, sacrifices, and drink-offerings in the temple. He polluted the sanctuary, set up altars to idols upon the altar of God and there sacrificed to their idols. He abolished circumcision, and tore up and burnt the books of the law (1 Macc. i).

Thus a portion of the predictions of Daniel were fulfilled one hundred years before the birth of Jesus, and what were not accomplished then, except the sealing up of the vision and prophecy, remain unfulfilled to this day.

One more quotation may be introduced here—the one from the last of the Jewish prophets whose writings hav been preserved to us in the canonical part of the Bible: "Behold, I will send my messenger, and he shall prepare the way before me: and the Lord whom ye seek shall suddenly come to his temple, even the messenger of the covenant whom ye delight in: behold, he shall come, saith the Lord of hosts" (Mal. iii, 1).

Was this prediction fulfilled by Jesus? When did he suddenly come to his temple? Luke, in the second chapter of his gospel, says that Joseph and Mary took their child to the temple, when the days of her purification were accomplished, as was the custom. There was nothing unusual, nothing sudden, nothing extraordinary about this; everything was done according to the common practices of the day. There was nothing in this to intimate that this child was in any way different from all other children.

It may be asserted that the blessing of Simon in the temple was something unusual. Perhaps it was, but what had that to do with his suddenly coming to his temple? Again, the personage spoken of by Malachi was to be the Lord whom they delighted in.

Did the Jews, as a people, show any special delight in Jesus, and recognize him as Lord? Some of his immediate followers may hav done so, but was there anything unusual in that? The same thing has been, is, and, it may reasonably be presumed, will continue to be done with other preachers and teachers by their followers, much the same as was done by the followers of Jesus.

By continuing on, and reading the context, something more may be learned about the person spoken of by Malachi. "But who shall abide the day of his coming? and who shall stand when he appeareth? for he is like a refiner's fire, and like fuller's soap: And he shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver, and he shall purify the sons of Levi, and purge them as gold and silver, that they may offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness. Then shall the offering of Judah and Jerusalem be pleasant unto the Lord, as in the days of old, and as in the former years" (Mal. iii, 2–4).

The second verse seems to intimate that the Lord should come with might, majesty, and power. When did Jesus cŏme in such a manner that it may reasonably hav been asked, Who shall stand when he appeareth? who shall abide the day of his coming? There was nothing terrible in his appearance; he exercised no power tending to strike terror into the hearts of the people.

It may be interesting to analyze the third and fourth verses:

> He shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver;
> He shall purify the sons of Levi, and
> Purge them as gold and silver,
> That they may offer an offering of righteousness.
> Then shall the offering be pleasant.

Without asking when Jesus sat as a refiner of silver, it may be pertinent to ask when he "purified" the sons of Levi, and purged them as silver and gold? when the Levites made an acceptable offering in righteousness after being purified? and what offering they ever made after being purified by Jesus that was pleasant unto the Lord, according to the teachings and belief of Christians? Yet these events were to follow as results of the appearance of the person spoken of by Malachi.

If the events predicted in the foregoing prophecies hav ever happened, we must look elsewhere than unto Jesus the son of Mary for the person in whom they were fulfilled.

A few other predictions may be noted, such as Haggai's saying, when speaking of the second temple, that it should be filled with glory, which our friend of the "Leading Predictions Concerning the Messiah" claims to hav been fulfilled by Jesus coming to that temple.

As has been already stated, in the year 170 B.C. that temple was pillaged by Antiochus Epiphanes, and all its ornaments, utensils, and treasures that could be found were carried away, and in 168 B.C. it suffered in the general conflagration and destruction of the city, and remained as a pile of ruins until the year 18 B.C., when Herod the Great, being king of Judea, restored the temple, which, as in the case of the boy's jackknife which had three new blades and two new handles, was really a rebuilding. Dr. Smith recognized this in his Household Dictionary of the Bible, where he says that "though almost a new edifice, it retained the name of second temple" (see article, Temple).

It is unnecessary to multiply these examples, for if we were to examin every one of them which is usually quoted by Christians, we should find the same result, namely, that these predictions failed to predict Jesus.

CERUS.

The Great Cryptogram.

"Mr. Donnelly's Reviewers," by William D. O'Connor (Belford, Clarke & Co.), should be read by every thoughtful person who has been made to believe that "The Great Cryptogram" is a delusion or a fraud. Immediately on the publication of Mr. Donnelly's book, Professor Colbert, a distinguished mathematician, having previously been admitted in confidence to a complete knowledge of all the laws and numbers of the cipher, disclosed or withheld, came out in an article in the Chicago Tribune and roundly certified, without qualification, to the absolute validity and reality of the cryptogram. And when Mr. Donnelly was in London Mr. Bidder, a queen's counsel and one of the most eminent mathematicians in England, after a careful study reported that the existence of the cipher was undeniable.

Subsequently two other eminent authorities rendered a similar judgment.

But prior to these reports, or before they were made public, most of the critics had rendered their premature verdict against Mr. Donnelly. And in view of this fact, which is only a repetition of the treatment received by numerous other great writers, who, after running the gauntlet of abuse, hav at last received their meed of praise from the slow justice of the common reader, Mr. O'Connor denounces the reviewers generally as worthless and mischievous.

He takes them up one by one, from the supercilious and pedantic Appleton Morgan to the bland and childlike critic of the New York Tribune, meets all their points and completely demolishes them. The editor of the New York Sun is treated tenderly, because "it is such a jolly joker and smiled for all." And Professor Davidson is let off lightly in hope of repentance for being too previous; but all the rest of "the tribe of Jack the Ripper" catch "fulgid hades."

The Baconian cipher is as certain as the multiplication table. And it is a significant fact that the Folio of 1632, which, of course, had to be all reset from that of 1623, is an absolute duplication of it, with all the seeming mistakes and perversions necessitated by the cipher.

BURR.

Two Sonnets to Ingersoll.

AN ALTOGETHER UNNECESSARY FEAR.

Thou, who above the loud-mouthed rage of priests,
And brawling babblers and their servil creeds,
Hast gathered with grand hands the withered reeds
Of their beliefs and broke them; made them feasts
To be mouthed on and mumbled but by beasts:
Thou to whom faith is naught but judgest deeds,
And hast through all the nation scattered seeds
Of reformation—unto thee the least
Of all thy friends givs greeting—thou the friend
Of all who need a friend:—we only fear,
We who admiring love thee, that the sphere
Wherein thou holdest station is too high
And holy for the sight of human eye,
And blinded, thou wilt falter in the end. L. DOUGHTY.

TO GAIN WISDOM.

Folly! to vaunt religion to the eye—
This sublimation of the soul t'invest
In earthy garments; or, as 'twere a hest,
To tell the susceptiv mind, Thou shalt not lie;
Wouldst thou teach fish to swim, or bird to fly,
Or men of hea'thy brain the normal quest—
As between foul and fair, how fair is best?
Teach then the swine their conduct in the sty!
Say rather, of religion, 'tis inborn,
Cannot be, more or less, by man instilled;
Of morals—as the needle to the pole—
Save from the law of nature vilely torn,
Whereof to hav the interspaces filled,
Heed the discourse of noble Ingersoll.

The Sabbath Union and Its Work.

From the American Union, Cleveland, O.

The Cuyahoga county Sabbath Convention was held at Music Hall, Friday morning, under the auspices of the American Sabbath Union. What a nice smooth-sounding name that is, to be sure! "American Sabbath Union!" How it lulls the people to sleep with sense of perfect security; for surely these exceptionally nice people who compose the "American Sabbath Union" can do nothing which the average citizen dare criticise! And yet nothing more forcibly illustrates the dire necessity of patriotic instruction in the school-room, from the lecture platform, and from that most influential of all public teachers, the independent, fearless, and honest newspapers of the country.

The Cuyahoga county Sabbath convention is one of the most thoroughly un-American gatherings, both in point of purpose and sentiments expressed, that has ever taken place in this city. The object of the convention, plainly and simply stated, is to compel the citizens of Cleveland, the state of Ohio, and the United States of America to observe the Sabbath, commonly called Sunday, according to the dictates and rules laid down by the American Sabbath Union. Of course the Constitution of the United States plainly provides that church and state shall be forever kept separate, but the Sabbath Union does not ask for a union of church and state. Oh, no! It simply demands of the national government that it enforce upon the people the strict observance of a national Christian Sabbath.

The whole spirit of the convention may be summed up in the expression of Judge Dickey, who in a fine (?) burst of eloquence expressed the ridiculous and insolent sentiment that if people who emigrate to this country do not conform to the "American Sabbath," they should be refused admittance. According to this patriotic idea the observance of the "American Sabbath," as provided by the rules laid down by the American Sabbath Union, is the chief qualification of American citizenship. The American Union wishes to be distinctly understood on this question. It denies that there is or ever has been such an institution as an American Sabbath.

The Sabbath and all religions are prominent in the Constitution of the United States only by their entire absence. The Christian Sabbath has absolutely no authority whatever to bind the conscience of an American citizen. The Constitution guarantees perfect religious liberty and equality before the law of all its citizens. That the rights of citizens in this respect are so often infringed upon, and sometimes openly denied, is simply because they hav allowed such religious organizations as the "American Sabbath Union" to influence legislation, with hardly a protest. If the people want their rights they must assert them. Unless they do this, and promptly, they will awake some morning to find themselvs bound hand and foot with religious fetters as galling as ever caused the Puritan fathers to flee from their nativ land and found a new world, a Constitution and government having for its watchword the perfect and absolute religious liberty of the individual, and the everlasting separation of church and state!

The population of this country is made up of "every nation under the whole heavens," and each one has a right to enjoy his or her own religion without asking permission of prophet, priest, or king, or even a majority of his neighbors. Sunday is observed as a Sabbath by Christians, Monday by the Greeks, Tuesday by the Persians, Wednesday by the Assyrians, Thursday by the Egyptians, Friday by the Turks, and Saturday by the Jews. Any one of them has in this country just as much right to establish his Sabbath by law as has the Christian. The fact that the Christians are more numerous does not giv them license to trample on the rights guaranteed the citizen by the Constitution, nor authority to force the people into religious observances at the dictation of the American Sabbath Union or any other religious organization.

The Alleged Resurrection of Jesus.

Mr. George W. Gere, who is described to us as the leading lawyer of central Illinois, has been edifying the people of that locality with a long lecture upon the resurrection of Jesus, which the Christians claim completely establishes, by the law of evidence, the reality of the reported miracle and the consequent divinity of Jesus and truth of Christianity. The lecture has been forwarded to us with a request for its consideration.

It is difficult to get a firm hold of Mr. Gere's arguments, for the reason that they are all based on the gospels and church writers, and disappear at once when it is shown that the gospels were not written when and by whom Mr. Gere supposes they were, and that church historians are notoriously unreliable. For instance: Mr. Gere givs us a circumstantial account of the life of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, and tells us when they wrote the books attributed to them. The fact is, however, that if biblical criticism has settled anything, it is that none of these men wrote the gospel bearing his name, and that none of these books was in existence for at least one hundred and twenty years after the alleged miracle occurred. This is the opinion, not of the enemies of Christianity, but of the best biblical scholars Protestantism has produced. The Acts of the Apostles, too, is equally removed in time from the scenes and incidents it describes, and is consequently of no more value in determining the truth of sacred history than the gospels. Add to this, the indisputable fact that these books contradict each other, and that each is undoubtedly filled with false statements, and we see at once how unreliable and worthless is any argument for the resurrection which does not go outside of the common channels in which the church has drifted for some seventeen centuries.

The allegation which the church makes is that a certain person called Jesus the Christ, after being dead and buried, rose from the dead and did not die again, but ascended into heaven. The only evidence for this, which is certainly a question capable of being judicially tested, is in those books which, we hav seen, are false in many things, contradictory of each other in many other things—and especially so on this one question—and are anonymously written, and of a date the only certainty concerning which is that it is about one hundred years later than alleged. The basis for proof of the miracle, therefore, is seen to be of a very unsubstantial sort.

But Mr. Gere knows nothing of all this, and goes as bravely to his task as though he lived in the ninth instead of the nineteenth century. He givs us as veritable history the paragraph concerning Jesus which every theological writer of any reputation at all knows Josephus never wrote, and he quotes the early church writers as innocently as though they were accurate historians of actual events instead of theologians making history to suit themselvs, and recording traditions of the grossest supernatural happenings as verities as real as the birth and death of human beings. With such an undiscriminating apologist there is no common ground of controversy. For he says:

"That the text of the Four Evangelists has been handed down to us in manner and form, letter and spirit, in which it was originally written, without having been materially corrupted or falsified, is a fact. The genuinness of these writings is as well sustained by proof as that of any ancient writing."

Now this statement is not only not a fact, but it is the very reverse of fact. It is admitted by the Christians themselvs that tens of thousands of errors hav at one time or another crept into the text of the New Testament, and the last revision committee found occasion to change the gospels in a great many hundreds of places. Even if we knew what the original of the gospels said, no more erroneous statement could be made than this by Mr. Gere, who has followed Greenleaf, and thereby betrayed the date and scope of his own researches.

Again, Mr. Gere's argument is of the exclamatory and assertiv kind that proves nothing. He asks:

"Who are we, that by arbitrary rules of our own making, limit the plans, purposes, laws, and workings of the infinit God, put bounds to the natural for him? With our finite and imperfect minds circumscribe the natural for God! Consider the majesty of God's power, the sublimity of his wisdom, and then why should it be thought a thing incredible (supernatural) that God should raise the dead?"

It ought not to be necessary to remind the leading lawyer of central Illinois that exclamations and assertions like this are positivly wasted in a legal argument. What does he know about an infinit God? How does he know God possesses power, and wisdom? In fact, what business has he to interject such obiter pleadings into his brief? They hav no bearing on the subject at all, unless he is willing to giv up trying to legally prove his case and throw himself upon the mercy of the court of faith. "God" and his attributes need fully as many rhetorical supports as do miracles.

The resurrection of Jesus is either an objectiv fact or a subjectiv doctrin. If the first, the style of argument adopted by the leading lawyer of central Illinois is not calculated to logically convince a jury. It is doubtful if he could convict a man of petit larceny with such statements. If the resurrection is, as many of the leading Protestant biblical critics hold, only a doctrin of the church, an illustration of the way of gaining immortality used by the early Christians, then we can take exclamation points and marks of interrogation to be as good arguments for it as any that can be invented by theologians. As an objectiv fact, however, the resurrection is so far from being proved as to fall into the columns of those stories of the past which men now know to be absolutely false. And for support of this statement we need not go outside of the gospels themselvs.

It is probable that somewhere in the East, at some time, something occurred to giv rise to the tradition of the resurrection. Religious fanatics are common, so are revolutionists and seditious persons with disciples. Crucifixion was also a common form of punishment. If Jesus ever lived, no doubt he was crucified. But the halo of divinity thrown around him by tradition or doctrinal expectation is completely dissipated when the accounts of his resurrection and ascension are examined and compared. In the first place, men are deceived, and men lie, but miracles do not happen. A thoroughly dead man has never yet been restored to health, nor has anyone, outside of the imagination of credulous and ignorant persons, been taken up into the air. These facts form strong evidence that the resurrection story is a myth, and we must hav the strongest direct proof that Jesus was the exception to these rules before we can even get his case on the docket. This we hav not got.

In all of the narrativs in the gospel the only point of agreement is that when the women went to the sepulcher they found Jesus absent, and a person in a white garment who assured them that he had risen. The four narrativs agree in nothing else. These women who spread the news did it solely on the word of some one else. They did not see him rise, and it is not recorded that the young man in a white garment was an eye-witness to the rising. Afterward the women saw some one whom they believed to be Jesus, a sight sufficient, undoubtedly, to make a belief in his resurrection spread rapidly, but not of itself sufficient evidence to establish the overthrow of natural law. On this point Greg says:

"It is clear that to prove such a miracle as the reappearance in life of a man who had been publicly slain, the direct and concurrent testimony of eye-witnesses would be necessary—that two or more should state that they saw him at such a time and place and knew him, and that this clear testimony should be recorded and handed down to us in an authentic document. This degree of evidence we might hav had—this we hav not. We hav epistles from Peter, James, John, and Jude—all of whom are said by the evangelists to hav seen Jesus after he rose from the dead, in none of which epistles is the fact of the resurrection even stated, much less that Jesus was seen by the writer after his resurrection. This point deserves weighty consideration. We hav ample evidence that the belief in Christ's resurrection was very early and very general among the disciples, but we hav not the direct testimony of any one of the twelve, nor of any eye-witness at all, that they saw him on earth after his death. Many writers say 'He was seen;' no one says, 'I saw him alive in the flesh.'"

In stating this so emphatically, Mr. Greg throws aside as utterly spurious the gospel of John, in the last chapter of which it is related that Peter testified to having seen Jesus in the flesh after his death, a rejection strictly in accord with the result of modern investigation into the authenticity of the gospels. Mr. Greg could hav done the same with the other gospels, so far as their being the writings of the generally accepted authors. But he did not know that the dates of the other three gospels must be set back almost a hundred years later than he thought. Paul's statement that he saw Christ is of no value, because it was in a vision; and Peter's testimony (1st Epistle iii, 21, 22) that Jesus went to heaven after his resurrection was only an affirmation of what he believed, and is very different from an assertion that Jesus had risen to an earthly life and that Peter had seen him. Other discrepancies in the accounts of Christ's appearance are, as given by Greg:

"They differ as to the number of the women. John mentions only one, Mary Magdalene; Matthew two, Mary Magdalene and the other Mary; Mark three, the two Marys and Salome; Luke several, the two Marys, Joanna, and 'certain others with them.'

"They differ as to the number of persons in white raiment who appeared to the women. Mark speaks of one 'young man;' Matthew of one 'angel;' Luke of two 'men;' John of two 'angels.' According to John, also, the appearance of the two angels was not till Mary's second visit to the tomb, after Peter and John had been there.

"They differ as to the words spoken by the apparitions. According to Matthew and Mark they asserted the resurrection of Jesus and his departure into Galilee, and sent a message to his disciples enjoining them to follow him thither. According to Luke they simply stated that he was risen, and referred to a former prediction of his to this effect. According to John they only asked Mary, 'Woman, why weepest thou?'

"They differ in another point. According to Matthew Luke, and John, the women carried the information as to what they had seen at once to the disciples. According to Mark 'they said nothing to any man.'

"They differ as to the parties to whom Jesus appeared. According to Mark it was no one. According to Matthew it was first to the two women, then to the eleven. According to John it was first to one woman, then twice to the assembled apostles. According to Luke it was first to no woman, but to Cleopas and his companion, then to Peter, and then to the assembled eleven.

"They differ as to the locality. According to Mark it was nowhere. According to Matthew it was first at Jerusalem and then in Galilee, whither the disciples went in obedience to the angelic command. According to Luke it was in Jerusalem and its vicinity, and there alone, where the disciples remained in obedience to the reiterated command of Jesus himself. According to the genuin part of John, also, the appearances were confined to Jerusalem."

We hav purposely used Greg's list, because he considers the gospels to hav been written only some thirty years after the affair is said to hav happened, and because he considers most of the books to be genuin. He is an advocate for Christianity, but has to admit that the miraculous part of it is not substantiated by evidence. Concerning these discrepancies he says: "Now, we put it to any candid man whether the discrepancies in these accounts are not of a nature, and to an extent, entirely to disqualify them from being received as evidence of anything, except the currency and credit of such stories among Christians thirty years after the death of Christ?" The stories are almost wholly different, and even if the writers were all contemporary with the events their narrativs form no historical evidence whatever. But this is not all. As to the crucifixion itself, and what happened at the time, there are as many inconsistent statements, and one may fairly doubt if the event itself is not as great a myth as the story of the resurrection and ascension. These inconsistencies and falsehoods hav all been pointed out many times by Christian apologists who hav tried to save the esoteric part of their religion by throwing away the miraculous and mythical shell which shrewd and unscrupulous writers put around it in the second and third centuries. To ignore the modern writers and confine one's reading to the old-style apologists, of which Greenleaf is a shining example, is to confess at once a total incompetence to deal with the matter. We recommend to the leading lawyer of central Illinois such works on the subject of the resurrection as "Supernatural Religion," Greg's "Creed of Christendom," "The Bible for Learners," Scott's "Life of Jesus," Amberley's "Analysis of Religious Belief," and others. On the age and authenticity of the books of the New Testament we can recommend the same books, and also the works of Dr. Westcott and Professor Davidson, which giv the history of the "holy books" so far as known.

But we may not take leave of this subject without one more word. The consensus of the intelligent world rejects the story for three reasons. First. That the resurrection of a dead man is contrary to all natural laws and all human experience. Second. If the accounts we hav of it were all written by the men and at the time alleged, their inconsistencies, contradictions, and discrepancies of statement would render their evidence of no worth. Third. That the tale is found in books of whose authorship we know nothing, and they are therefore entitled to no credence. On the other hand, we know that the books were written in an ignorant and superstitious age, when men believed in the miraculous and thought no event too strange to be true. Indeed, one of the men of the early church asserted that he believed a statement because it was impossible. A resurrection from the dead was nothing for them to believe, and a stupendous miracle or a convulsion of nature was a mere trifle too common to excite wonder. Gulliver's travels would to them hav been veritable history. Of course in such an age we should expect just such tales as the gospels afford. But to ask men in this age to believe them is to strain the sanguin altogether beyond its capacity.

The Bible in Our Schools.

In the chapter on Education of the laws of 1882 of this state occurs this section:

"Sec. 1062. No school shall be entitled to or receive any portion of the school moneys in which the religious doctrins or tenets of any particular Christian or other religious sect shall be taught, inculcated, or practiced, or in which any book or books, containing compositions favorable or prejudicial to the particular doctrins or tenets of any particular Christian or other religious sect shall be used, or which shall teach the doctrins or tenets of any other religious sect, or which shall refuse to permit the visits and examinations provided for in this chapter. But nothing herein contained shall authorize the board of education to exclude the holy scriptures, without note or comment, or any selections therefrom, from any of the schools provided for by this chapter; but it shall not be competent for the said board of education to decide what version, if any, of the holy scriptures, without note or comment, shall be used in any of the schools; provided that nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to violate the rights of conscience as secured by the Constitution of this state and of the United States."

It will be seen by this that the Christians hav got the Bible solidly entrenched by law in our schools, and that no Board of Education can interfere with the training of children in the Christian religion. Neither can the Board decide as to the Protestant or Catholic version to be read; that is left to the principal of the school, and the version depends upon the Catholic or Protestant proclivities of that individual.

In this we see the fine Italian hand of the pope, or his representativs. The law was framed for New York city. After it was drawn Tammany Hall fell from its high estate, and remained the under political dog for some years. Now that it has regained its power, one of its first moves has been to endeavor to obtain a law whereby the Board of Education should be appointed from the wards, one member from each. This would giv Tammany Hall a majority, and the principals employed in the various schools would hav been chosen from the Roman Catholic sect. By this roundabout way does Archbishop Corrigan propose to control our public schools as well as his own parochial schools.

As the schools are now organized, under the above quoted law, the teachers read the Bible or not as best suits them. In some schools Bible-reading and religious songs are as regular as the secular studies. In others, there is nothing of the sort. But if the Catholics get control of the Board of Education it will not be long before the Catholic version of the "holy scriptures" will be found in every schoolhouse in the city.

The Righteousness of the Nine Demands.

The following letter is from a gentleman whose instincts are evidently right, but who speaks hastily:

"CAMERON, W. VA., June 9, 1889.

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav had thoughts of calling your attention to some objections to the Nine Demands which appear to be well founded, and had commenced an article to that effect, and if you wish will write on that head.

"To giv you an idea. The Demands forbid the Bible in the schools, which involves a governmental censorship not tolerable to a free people. Why not limit the Demand to a non-interference with the books, and trust with Jefferson that when truth has an even chance with error it can look out for itself. Again: Chaplaincies are forbidden. Why not merely let those who want them pay for them out of their own pockets, and that would be all that would be needed, while it would be really more Liberal? Of course I hav no space here to elucidate and illustrate.

"I am Liberally Christian in my religious sentiments, and in favor of open discussion of all subjects, which I suspect to be more Liberal than THE TRUTH SEEKER itself, and in favor of every step that leads to an upward development of humanity. Yours, etc., J. W. MOSS."

Forbidding the use of the Bible in the public schools is not at all a governmental censorship, for it is absolutely necessary in order to obtain justice between the people, especially for the minority. The public schools are established to instruct the children of all the people in secular knowledge. There are a great many people who do not desire to hav their children taught Christianity, but the Christians being in the majority impose their views upon the schools, and the consequence is that unless the parents take pains to teach the children otherwise, the little ones grow up with the notion that God made the world, that Christ saved it, and that hell is their final destination unless they believe it. The majority always hav imposed and always will impose their religious views upon public institutions they control. They are convinced that they know it all, and teach as absolutely certain many things which are not only not known, but cannot be known, because there is no way of proving them. And such is the arrogant attitude of the Christian church that it requires unusual methods to restrain her. See the way, for instance, she has intrenched herself in the statutes of New York. Again, this provision to completely secularize the public schools is necessary to protect religious people as well as Infidels. If the matter is left to the discretion of individuals, to school boards, we shall hav schools teaching Christianity, others Judaism, others Materialism, others Spiritualism, and so on. But the last three parties hav no more right to impose their views upon the children of Christians than the latter hav to indoctrinate the children of the former with their other-world speculations. The schools must be kept absolutely free from all interference of religious or irreligious persons. Each parent has the right to hav his child left alone on these matters; and each child has the right to be left alone until he is of sufficient age to form his own opinion on matters speculativ. Nothing should ever be taught a child which the teacher does not know. The natural credulity of the race burdens people with quite enough fancies. If a man desires his child instructed in guesswork, let him hire a private teacher. No one in charge of a public school has the moral right to make Mr. Moss pay him for teaching Mr. Moss's child what Mr. Moss does not wish his child to hear. Truth will never hav an even chance with error if the upholders of error are in the majority and can do as they please with truth's champions. Truth stands a poor chance of winning a child when the law allows a Calvinist or a Catholic to mold its mind. "Non-interference with the books" means interference with them by the ruling majority, and that means embodying in them not only what the majority knows, but also what it guesses. Therefore it is that our schools must be forbidden to impart religious ideas, or any ideas not based on perfect knowledge.

As for chaplaincies, what right hav a body of men chosen and paid by all the people to spend their time gratifying their private religious notions? If a legislator feels that he cannot be honest and serve the people well without supernatural aid, let him go to church in the morning at his own expense before he goes to the chamber of legislation. He has no more right to take his preacher into the state house to perform ministerial functions than he has to take his barber there, and to insist that he shall shave him and all the other members. Religion is as purely a private matter as shaving, and no man has a right to crowd his personal preferences upon other people.

Another reason why the majority should not be allowed the privilege of forcing their private notions upon the people in the way desired by Mr. Moss, is that such procedure is a practical recognition by the state of a peculiar religion, and thereby renders it to that extent the state religion. This the people did not expect their representativs to do, and did not want done. Legislators are chosen to make temporal, not spiritual laws. They hav no right at all to use their public position to advertise their private views on religion, or to obtain for that religion the advantage of official advocacy. It is a swindle and an outrage upon those of their constituents who do not agree with them.

Therefore we strenuously maintain that the Nine Demands of Liberalism are right and Mr. Moss is wrong. A "Liberal Christian" is very apt to fall into the error Mr. Moss has fallen into; for in spite of their boasted Liberality, "Liberal Christians" usually hav a stronger leaning toward the latter part of their designation than toward the former.

Editorial Notes.

AT Pittsburgh, Pa., on the second Sunday after the Johnstown catastrophe the Rev. James Madden, a Prohibitionist clergyman from Kansas, addressed a meeting held under the auspices of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. Previously he had visited Johnstown. He described the manner of his leaving the place as follows:

"I was in Johnstown when the flood occurred, but managed through my own energy and perseverance to escape the flood. Those who had not done so let a warning six hours old go unheeded, waited, were drowned, and went to hell."

It is to the credit of his audience that the majority of them left the church at once, showing that though they may be theoretical Christians they do not approve of its practical application. If Christianity be true Madden was right, and it takes just such brutes as he to prove that most people are not real believers. Their humanity is after all greater than their faith in "God" and "God's word."

MR. HARRISON is reported in the Boston Herald as saying concerning his Sunday yacht trips:

"Don't you think they are utterly unreasonable? As you know, no one is more solicitous for the proper observance of Sunday than I am, and no one would be more scrupulous about his own conduct in this respect than I hav been; yet these newspapers are trying to make people believe that I hav suddenly become grossly inconsistent in this regard. They know just how it is. They know that I hav no other time for rest, and they know that I must rest if I am to keep on with my work."

That is right, reasonable, and logical, says the World. But there are tens and hundreds of thousands of people in this city who can say with more literal truth than Mr. Harrison says it, that they "hav no other time for rest." The World insists that the president's argument is sound, and that it applies to the workingmen and shop-girls and all the other people as well as to him. In a country like ours, which has no state church and has no business to prescribe Sabbaths and holy days, every man ought to be free to rest on the day of rest in the way that he finds most restful to him. It is against interference with this liberty that we ceaselessly protest.

THE Commonwealth, of Port Angeles, Wash., says:

"THE TRUTH SEEKER makes some curious mistakes in an attempt to criticise HENRY GEORGE. To see how it mixes itself up in the use of terms it does not understand is amusing. Before Brother Macdonald essays another criticism of Henry George he should get his works and the back numbers of the Standard and read them carefully. If he does so he will find his criticisms without foundation in fact and may be able to answer intelligently some, if not all, of the conundrums he propounds."

With the exceptions that THE TRUTH SEEKER has made no criticism of Henry George, that Brother Macdonald read "Progress and Poverty" probably before the editor of the Commonwealth ever heard of the book, and has read all of the numbers of the Standard and all of Mr. George's works that hav been published, the above is well enough. It is a good many years since we first encountered Mr. George, and the first recommendation to read his scheme came from his own lips. The reason that we hav not publicly criticised it is because on the whole it helps industrial progress, and when people arrive at the point of adopting it its inadequacy will be so apparent that they will drop it and think out a much plainer and better one.

MR. MORRIS K. JESSUP, in speaking of opening the Metropolitan Museum Sundays, displayed his usual exquisit good sense and kindly feeling:

"If the working people can't go up to see its collections during the day, let them go up there during the two evenings in the week when it is open, instead of patronizing rum-shops. I think I know the poor of New York city as well as any other man, and I know the plan won't work."

"Mr. Jessup 'knows the poor of New York city' just as we should expect a man of his type to know them, says Life. He knows the worst side of the worst class, and recognizes no other. It is certainly a mistake that this man, whose reputation in business circles is by no means the envy of many whose pious professions are less than his, should be allowed to exercise his influence in matters of such importance. Mr. Jessup as an expert upon art and morals is too offensiv an idea to be considered funny. The public, the poor, and overworked, hav a right to see the museum upon Sunday, their only day of leisure. And that a man like Morris Jessup should be allowed to bring his eccentric morality between them and an art museum is a cruel joke upon the working classes.

Letters from Friends.

EL DORADO, KAN., June 9, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to correct an error in THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 18, 1889, in regard to the Bruno statue fund. You gave my name as J. W. Butcher, El Dorado, Col., instead of T. W. Butcher, El Dorado, Kan. Please correct this in your next issue, and oblige a subscriber.

T. W. BUTCHER.

ARLINGTON, ORE., May 21, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Dr. Driver used this argument to prove the trinity: "The son coexisted from the beginning with the father, for there couldn't be a father without a son." He was answering a set of questions supposed to hav been asked him by some doubter. I would like to see him floored. Here among his people he is thought to be par excellence.

Yours truly, HOSEA WOOD.

MONTREAL, CAN., June 10, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I hav now been a subscriber for the last eighteen months, and hastening to renew for a term of another year expresses my opinion, I think, of THE TRUTH SEEKER. For its bright and excellent editorials, and Watson Heston's capital illustrations, I can only offer the highest words of praise. I wish still further success for your paper.

Yours respectfully, JOHN R. CONWAY.

MADISON, May 10, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: The grand old TRUTH SEEKER is ever welcome to my house. J. E. Remsburg lectured here April 26th. We had a fine audience, but small. All the brains in the town was there. The subject was "False Claims." The bigots threw up their hands in holy horror. They hav often asked the question, What has Infidelity ever done? If they would hav attended his lecture he would hav told them. We are going to hav him again this fall. WM. CROGHAN.

ADRIAN, MICH., June 10, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER is ably edited, and contains very much able matter; but in my opinion you should steer clear of Anarchy, Socialism, and Harman and company. I cannot countenance orthodoxy, Anarchy, or anything that conflicts with good government, but am impregnated clear through with a righteous repugnance to priestcraft and its machinations. You hav my sincere wish for the prosperity of THE TRUTH SEEKER and promulgation of Freethought and science. As the priest says, Ora pro nobis.

Very sincerely, O. S. BARRETT.

MONTPELIER, IND., June 5, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Please explain some scripture if you can. I can find nothing in the Bible proving that the women get to heaven, and the only one that ever did get there fled to the wilderness as soon as she could (Rev. x, 11), which proves that heaven is no place for the women. I hav concluded not to go to heaven because there are no women there, and others express the same opinion. I think John the Divine had the delirium tremens, and thought it was prophecy, when he saw the revelations. What is your opinion? How could the loaded ark float when it was thirty cubits high and the water only fifteen cubits deep (Ingersoll to the contrary)? See Gen. vii, 20. H. B. ALLEN.

JASPER, ALA., June 3, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Last night I had a social discussion with an allopathic doctor on various religious subjects. He has a classical education, and in his remarks, in answer to a question, Was the earth made before the sun? he said it was. Now, I wish to ask, are our colleges teaching that kind of astronomy now? Again, he said it made no difference how moral a life we lived, if we did not believe Jesus Christ died to save us, we should be lost; also he believed in eternal punishment. Are our colleges teaching this kind of belief and morals? Can the colleges teach truth and demonstrate it? If they can, why do not their students all know alike? All truth is demonstrable, and when it is understood there will be no need of disputes. J. K. DEARTH.

BARRE, MASS., June 17, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I am so delighted with your efforts against Romanism that I must express my appreciation of them; also, of all your editorials against the union of state and church. I fear many of your readers are not yet alive to the grave responsibilities resting upon them relativ to these two mighty questions. More depends upon nipping in the bud, or arresting the blossoming of, these two gigantic evils, than upon all else combined. Once let either of these parties succeed, then farewell to all progress. Protestantism with God in the Constitution would be disastrous enough, but with Romanism in the ascendency, who but a Roman Catholic would wish to liv?

Heston still exceeds himself. I trust his shadow—his reality—in THE TRUTH SEEKER will never be less.

Cordially, ELLA E. GIBSON.

MR. EDITOR: There seem to be so few ladies connected with the Freethinkers that I think they ought all, by letter or otherwise, to show upon which side they belong, and having lately joined the ranks, I thought I would write a few words. The question in my mind, the past week or two, as I read my morning paper, has been, Where, oh, where was God when the dreadful flood came down upon Johnstown? No doubt many of his faithful followers called upon him in agonizing tones, but he did not hear; he spared not churches or homes, old or young, pious or ungodly. As one paper has it, "God moves in a mysterious way his wonders to perform." We would much prefer he would not perform such wonders in this vicinity. And as I looked at some of the illustrations, I thought no picture of the infernal regions could be worse. Several ministers in this city preached upon this subject yesterday, but I could not go and hear them praise God for such a deed. We enjoy reading your paper very much, and learn much that is helpful and good from its pages. That it may always continue to be as good, is the wish of, Your friend, MRS. W. B. CLARK.

EAU CLAIRE, WIS., June 8, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. J. H. Wood's last letter indeed convinces me that he is some way from being an Anarchist. He says Anarchists believe they now enjoy the rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and also think they can improve on the Declaration of Independence. Both these assertions are mistaken. Anarchists know better than anyone else that they do not enjoy their rights. They think they would enjoy them if the Declaration of Independence had not been set aside by the Constitution. Mr. Wood seems to think likewise. He is traveling in the right way, only he is further from the goal than might be supposed when he says that law is the coward's weapon and must be destroyed before there can be peace on earth. That is very good Anarchism. But I don't see where government will be when law is destroyed. If Mr. Wood can explain that, he may convert me from Anarchism. If he cannot, I shall cherish the hope of converting him. I think he is mistaken in saying that he has seen years of free currency issued by individuals. He never saw a currency which the individuals who issued it were not required to redeem in specie. But under Anarchy he soon would. C. L. JAMES.

POCAHONTAS, ILL., May 12, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: A suggestion and a query. I would suggest that every Liberal who can procure the "Cosmian" or any Liberal songbook do so and attend the orthodox meetings, especially camp-meetings and holiness meetings, where singers are always in demand, and sing our Liberal songs. Thereby will the orthodox discover the superior sentiments of truth and morality there inculcated.

Query: But by what means are we to reach the Catholics, the most dangerous because the most numerous, prejudiced, ignorant, and obstinate? The incidental methods of proselyting are too slow. For every one the church loses it gains several. Although unanswerable arguments may be produced by eminent scholars by wholesale quantity and circulated gratuitously, proving beyond all question the fallacy and danger of Catholicism, it is lost to that organization. Our only safeguard lies in instructing the Catholic youth. But how and by whom shall this be done? Individual and voluntary effort is the only hope. Let every Freethinker, every truth seeker, feel himself individually responsible to our government to use every exertion to win every Catholic he or she can, no matter how unpleasant the task is. And in this way, I believe, sooner or later, will the power of the church be rendered no longer dangerous.

EX-REV. JOSEPH N. MAXEY.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., May 25, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: The Presbyterians had a general assembly in session for nine days here. In going home I missed the train, so I had to wait. Nearly an hour I had to wait there, when two sleek gentlemen came inquiring for the lookout train. They were told it would come in twenty minutes. They took seats next to me. The younger one was rather boisterous for a pulpit man, and said to me, "I believe I saw you in church last night." "You are mistaken, for I don't go to any church." "You are a Christian, I suppose." "Another mistake. I take no stock in Christianity." "You are not a Jew." "I can afford to belong to myself and do my own thinking. I am a nonconformist." "How I pity the old man!" turning to the bystanders, "he does not believe in God. He is an Infidel." "You don't know. Wait, I believe you are too hasty, like all your brethren of the pulpit. When you find some resistance you are not willing to take in your horn; then you treat one to abusiv and malicious language. Such is the average man of your trade. You never practice charity, though you use the word frequently." The lookout train came in. I believe the deputy of God was glad to leave. Then an old drunken farmer asked where I shall go after death. "I suppose they will find a place for me the same as for you. I hav no hope or fear. The only thing is, that no one shall say, 'He was dishonest.' This is my only ambition."

My life is run out. I feel it, and I am glad to be released from the suffering, rheumatism, and decrepitude. I hav handed my funeral sermon to a friend to read at my grave. But I must hav THE TRUTH SEEKER till the last.

J. P. MULLER.

DENVER, COL., May 30, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: A week ago a copy of the Rocky Mountain Christian Advocate was handed me, in which I saw a sermon preached by Bishop Warren, of the Methodist Episcopal church, at the dedication of Grace church in this city. Contrasting the difference between the views of the skeptic and the Christian, he said: "Maudsley, Büchner, and Draper reprobate the idea of the exaltation of mind over matter. Let their theories go down to the vile dust from whence they sprung, 'Unwept, unhonored, and unsung.'" Then said he: "On the contrary, revelation tells us that the soul is a gift or a part of the great God, and that it is masterly for molding the body from germ to manhood; for directing all its developed energies, and finally for energizing them into an independent, lofty, self-sustained being in other realms."

It follows that everyone having a soul has a part of God; and then it follows that God is infinitly divisible. My first deduction is that every part must be just alike, except in quantity; in that the parts may differ. Second, every part must be as old as the whole. Third, if God had no creator, then no part had a creator. Fourth, if God cannot suffer, neither can a soul. Fifth, if a soul can sin, a part of God can sin, and if God ever damns a soul he damns a part of himself. Sixth, if Christ ever died to save a soul, he died to save a part of God. If it is essential to the nature of God to be intelligent, would it not be equally so to every part of God? If the above deductions be legitimate, they express the theology of the bishop; and the people of course accept what their bishop says, for the bishop knows, and he knows that every part of God is as old as all the parts. But the creeds say God is without body, parts, or passions, and in his image man was created. I would hav thought he would hav scared that old snake out of the garden. If souls are a part of God, they never were created and hence hav no creator to worship. A. B. PIKARD.

WAVERLY, WASH., May 19, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been taking THE TRUTH SEEKER about five years, and I do not think I hav misspent the money I hav sent you for the paper or thrown away the time in reading it. It will be enough for me to say I am pleased with your paper. I do not think I would stop the paper on account of Heston's pictures, or because there was something in the paper that did not suit me. You are doing a good work in fighting the Christian superstition. Christianity is not a blessing, but a curse. There is more contention and disagreement in the churches here than there is on the outside, but of course this is nothing extraordinary.

The Northwest Tribune of May 3d has a short article in it about evolution. This paper is published at Spokane Falls, George F. Schorr its editor. Mr. Schorr does not think very favorably of the doctrin of evolution, and if it could be proved, he says, it would amount to nothing. It is evident the editor of the Tribune does not want his imaginary God displaced, and as to evolution amounting to nothing, that is just his idea about it. Science amounts to something, and it seems to me if evolution is true, which it undoubtedly is, it should be the science of all sciences. It should be of as much importance, anyway, as to discover an open polar sea or to reach the north pole. What do worlds amount to according to Mr. Schorr's view of this question? His wife is nothing, the horse he uses is nothing, the ox is nothing, the pig is nothing except in pork chops, the beautiful rose is nothing. Well, I hav read a good deal about evolution, but this is the most convincing of all—convincing of the greatest stupidity—and I am surprised an intelligent man would put such a thing in his paper.

Can you furnish me with a life of Voltaire, "The World's Sixteen Crucified Saviors," Remsburg's "Bible Morals" and "Sabbath Breaking?" How much money shall I hav to send for all of them? Yours truly, B. F. DASHIELL.

NEW YORK CITY, June 16, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Reading the accounts of the recent terrible disaster at Johnstown, Pa., suggested to my mind some thoughts which I hav decided to offer to the valued TRUTH SEEKER, thinking perhaps they may promote a wholesome thinking on the part of some of the readers thereof in relation to the supposed control of events by an almighty God. Let me ask, Where was God when the North-fork dam broke, causing the trouble, suffering, and death of thousands of his innocent and helpless creatures? I see by the papers that several prominent ministers, mentioning the disaster in their sermons, take great pains to explain that it was not an act of God almighty's, but was caused by the defectiv workmanship of man in the building of the dam. Well, supposing the dam was defectiv in construction, God is almighty—why did he not stay the terrible tide of destruction and death? What has become of his almighty power over waters and floods? Once he was able to say to the raging sea, "Peace, be still!" and the waters recognized the voice of God and immediately became calm. At another time he caused the waters of the Red sea to divide and stand up in great banks, leaving a path over which the children of Israel passed dryshod. I say, what has become of all this mighty power? Has God lost it? Are those accounts untrue? Was God unable to divert the Johnstown disaster, or did he wilfully sacrifice the lives of thousands of innocent women and children, when he claims to love us more than earthly parents love their children? What earthly parent would stand by and see his children suffer a horrible death when it lay in his power to save them therefrom? Then the worshipers of God must either admit that God almighty has lost his power—that he could not avert the Johnstown disaster—or that, in spite of his protestations of love for his people, he cared for them so little that he sits placidly on his throne in heaven and allows and witnesses the destruction of thousands of them in so horrible a manner. Giv me the love of my mother; Christians are welcome to the love of such a God. In reading the account of the disaster in the New York World of Tuesday, June 4th, I came across the following account of a supposed miracle (I inclose paragraph containing said account, cut from said paper). If I were a Christian and knew that statement to be absolutely true, that alone would force me to pronounce such a God the greatest monster imaginable. What! Christians relate that as an example of God's almighty power, in the face of the terrible sufferings and death of thousands of his people? Then, too, if the first Commandment emanated from God himself, that statue, made in the likeness of the Virgin Mary and worshiped by man, should hav been a subject for his wrath, rather than his protection. I say, a veritable hell would be too good for a God who would protect a statue and take no heed of the horrible sufferings of thousands of helpless women and children. They say the disaster was caused solely by the imperfection of the dam. Would it hav happened if the water had not risen to such an unprecedented hight as to overflow the dam? And who caused the rain that caused the waters of the lake to rise to such a hight? Again, I see by the World of June 13th, a railroad train, carrying a Methodist Sunday-school excursion from Armagh to Warren Point, a watering-place at the mouth of Murry river in County Down, Ireland, was thrown down an embankment and nearly one hundred Sunday-school children and teachers were killed. How can men with reasoning powers, and any amount of brains at all, believe that a God controls events and occurrences in this our world, in the face of such plain evidences to the contrary? When will man be guided by reason, rather than superstition? May this slight effort hav some influence, however small, in downing superstition and elevating some fellow-being to the lofty plain of mental liberty. CHAS. DUNHAM.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., June 15, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been much interested in the discussions between the Materialists and Spiritualists, and other vital questions. I am glad that we hav a paper like THE TRUTH SEEKER where we all can discuss our differences, each side having an equal chance. Free discussion helps us to see all sides of a question; the better chance to arrive at the truth which we are all seeking for. Our Liberal Club holds meetings every Sunday night, and after the lecture criticisms are in order, the lecturer having the closing speech. They are well attended, and a great deal of interest is manifested.

Dr. Juliet H. Severance lectured two weeks ago on the subject, "Is Marriage a Failure?" by request. Although a stormy night, the hall was full, and great attention was given during the lecture. A fine report was given by one of our leading city papers, the Milwaukee Sentinel. All this showed what an interest is taken upon that question at the present time.

I was in Chicago last week, and attended one of the meetings of the Secular Union there, and was very much interested in the way they conducted their meetings. I had the honor to be invited to attend a musical and literary entertainment, to be followed by a dance. A very pleasant episode took place after the entertainment was over and before the dance commenced. It happened to be the birthday of their worthy president, E. A Stevens, who had filled the chair so ably and to the entire satisfaction of all. Mrs. Freeman, the noted Freethought lecturer, stepping forward, made a fitting speech complimentary of Mr. Stevens, and in behalf of the society presented him with an elegant gold watch and chain. Everyone who knows Mr. Stevens knows that he is a very ready talker at any time. But in this case he got up to reply but was so choked with his emotions that he had to sit down; it was a complete surprise to him. True merit was appreciated in this case. Loud was the applause all over the hall.

A word right here. I think there never was a time when it was so important for every Liberal to exert all his power and influence in the cause of Freethought and equal liberty to all as at the present time. The church powers are making their greatest effort to suppress all advancement of the Liberal cause, knowing full well that it must be done quickly if done at all. There will be a great effort to pass the Blair bill in our next Congress, and they stand a good show for it.

I am very much pleased with the editorials of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and would recommend that everyone read them, and they will get a better idea of what the church power is doing. PROF. A. B. SEVERANCE.

QUEENSBURY, N. Y., June 1, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: It has been reported about here that the enemies of Thomas Paine violated his grave and took up his bones and took them to England, and then ground them to powder and sifted the dust in the river. (I should not think they would want to poison the river.) You living so near New Rochelle, the place of Thomas Paine's burial, I think you would be likely to know the truth of the above report.

1. I hav the will of Thomas Paine, and it says: "I know not if the society of people called Quakers admit a person to be buried in their burying-ground who does not belong to their society, but if they do or will admit me I would prefer being buried there, and if not, bury me on my farm at New Rochelle." Now the question arises, did they admit or allow him to be buried there? I understand they did not. People say he recanted his former principles; now, here is a good evidence that he did not recant, for they did not allow him to be buried in their burying-ground. If he had recanted they would hav buried him in their bosoms—or at least they would hav taken him in their bosoms and carried him to their father Abraham and tucked him in by the side of their uncle Lazarus. Now, here is proof beyond a question that he did not recant.

2. But they say he was a very bad, immoral man. If he recanted they would not say he was a bad man. They would say he was a very good man, and would honor his grave with a monument as high as the tower of Babel—or Jacob's ladder that reached up to heaven, where the gods ran up and down like squirrels—and put on large letters of gold: "To the honor of St. Paine," and hold him up far above St. Matthew or any other New Testament saint.

3. And they farther say that he was extremely poor and suffered for something to liv upon in his last days. In his will he had two hundred and fifty acres of land to will away, besides $1,500 in the Phœnix Insurance Company, besides all of his movables and money in his trunk. Now, if he had recanted they would not hav called him poor, but would hav reckoned him almost as great a farmer as their Uncle Job of the East, though perhaps not as owning a thousand yoke of oxen and maybe not fourteen hundred sheep.

4. There is one thing certainly they would not hav done if it be true as we hav heard, and that is, they would not hav turned hyena and violated his grave, but would hav held it sacred and watched it with as much care as did Jesus's followers his grave—and perhaps hav raised him in the same way, if he had recanted.

5. If Thomas Paine had recanted, the church would hav held him up and used him as a tool in all their protracted meetings to warn sinners and drive them into the church. They would cry out, The great Infidel dare not die without repenting and recanting! Did they ever do this? If not, then here is proof that he did not recant, and here are five witnesses that ought to make the church blush for shame. We are sure the devil would blush and be ashamed.

ASA W. BRAYTON.

[In 1819 Wm. Cobbett, an admirer of Paine, exhumed his bones and carried them to England, but what he did with them has never been known.—ED. T. S.]

GARDEAN, PA., June 11, 289.

MR. EDITOR: Fearing that you are not acquainted with the account of the Johnstown great miracles, and thinking it would be a pity the wicked skeptic should remain in ignorance of such valuable information concerning the wonderful power of God in preserving his chosen people, I thought perhaps it may not altogether be displeasing to your readers, so will send you some clippings from the Saturday Globe. Two of the Buffalo papers giv the same account.

Now let me ask, is it not equally as reasonable as the mythical yarn given in the so-called word of God? Or in other words, is it not twin-sister with the account of the water separating to let the chosen through unharmed, then coming together and drowning all the enemy? In this case at Johnstown God must hav shown little preference for his own people, as a large majority of the drowned were Catholics. They were known by the charm worn around the neck. Had God dealt equally with his chosen, he would hav saved all the Catholics by some miraculous circumstance.

It is my opinion, anyone that can swallow such stuff is capable of swallowing a whale.

Success to THE TRUTH SEEKER, the grand old treasure, and all who are fortunate enough to read it. May it ever be substituted for that impure, unholy Bible, as it has been in my house, is the sincere desire of a friend to Universal Mental Liberty. Respectfully, MRS. E. N. FAIRCHILD.

The miracle, as it is called, that happened at the church of the Immaculate Conception has caused a great sensation. A large number of persons will testify as to the nature of the event, and, to put it mildly, the circumstances are really remarkable. May devotions were in progress on Friday night when the water descended on Cambria City. The church was filled with people at the time, but when the noise of the flood was heard the congregation hastened to get out of the way. They succeeded, as far as escaping from the interior was concerned, and in a few minutes the church was partially submerged, the water reaching fifteen feet up the sides and swirling around the corners furiously. The building was badly wrecked, the benches were torn out, and the entire structure, both inside and out, was fairly dismantled. Monday morning, when an entrance was forced through the blocked doorway, the ruin appeared to be complete. One object alone had escaped the water's wrath. The statue of the Blessed Virgin, that had been decorated and adorned because of the May devotions, was as unsullied as the day it was made. The flowers, the wreaths, the lace veil, were undisturbed and unsoiled. Not a wrinkle was observed in the outlines. The marks on the wall show that the statue, which is three feet high, was submerged. The surface of the water had risen to a hight of fifteen feet, while the statue had been saved from contact with the liquid.

In the northwest part of the town is located the Irish Catholic church and convent. The mother of the convent saw the wave coming, which, she says, was mountain high. She at once called all the sisters into the chapel. Here the dozen nuns began to pray as they positivly never prayed before for protection from the water. When the water struck the building it shattered the entire structure and every room except the one where the sisters knelt in prayer. The room is still standing.

PORTSMOUTH, O., June 16, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: A few lines from this place may be of interest. As I write the church bells are chiming, calling men, women, and children to listen to drowsy sermons and meaningless words. The principal topic now being handled by the sky-pilots is the Johnstown horror, and to the "almighty friend" they attribute it. "There was some hidden sin among the people of the Conemaugh valley," say these pulpit orators. But the question has been asked, "What about the people living miles away from the valley, who were passing through on railway trains and were lost?" What about the innocent babe, the loving mother, the kind father? What about the honest man and the virtuous woman? Did the really good hav a hidden sin? Is it not a fact that the good were drowned as well as the bad?—that no discrimination was made between saint and sinner? Those who happened to be within range of the rushing water were lost. The talented divine and the veriest sinner went down together.

For the benefit of the Johnstown sufferers this city has raised over $3,000, and is raising more. At the citizens' meeting, called for the purpose of securing subscriptions, Rev. (?) C. L. Work, who occupies the pulpit of the Second Presbyterian church, and who is a strong Prohibitionist, was made chairman, and accepted the first donation, that of $45, from J. E. Esselbom, a brewer. In speaking of this incident a daily paper truthfully said: "Even the church and the brewery can clasp hands across the dark chasm out of which come the groans of the dying and the starving." Humanity, that grand word which embraces all there is, is prompter to this feeling.

In addition to the already numerous churches in this city another has been added. It is under canvas. Its owners are what are known as the Seventh Day Adventists. They hav told their hearers of the second coming of Christ, but as yet hav failed to giv dates. Like all other religious sects, the only good about them is their morality, which is shaped by actions and not by belief.

A few days since a young man was discussing the Bible with an Adventist and a German Methodist. The young fellow said he believed in treating it like all other books, that is, read it carefully and at the same time hav your reason wide open; accept the good in it, and throw away the bad. The Adventist held that to understand its chapters and its verses one should allow one inspired writer to explain the other. In this way no contradiction would appear.

"But," said the young man, "no writer, inspired or not inspired, can make Noah a saint at the time he drank wine and became intoxicated; Lot a virtuous man, when he committed incest with his daughters; Abraham a loving husband; David a pure man, or Solomon anti-Mormon."

"Oh, but here," chipped in the "Dutch" Methodist, "those things were only put in there to show us the difference between good and evil."

"My friend," replied the young Liberal, "I used to drink, chew, and smoke. Church-members told me I could never quit my bad habits without being washed in the 'blood of the lamb.' I hav quit them, and without the church's assistance, for I do not believe in it as a divine institution. And furthermore, I did not turn the pages of the Bible to see which was good and which was evil. I didn't read of Noah's high lonesome, of Lot's incest, nor of the badness of Abraham, David, and Solomon. If I had, the probability is I would hav grown worse instead of better. And it is my opinion that such biographies are not calculated to be read to children, if you desire that they be obedient and good."

This closed the argument. The Adventist had no more to say, and the Methodist hadn't either. WILL S. ANDRES.

MAKANDA, ILL., June 10, 289.

MR. EDITOR: The death, on the 16th of March, of my loving and beloved daughter, Mrs. Della W. Coller, made it necessary for me to remove to this place. I may say that my daughter was an intelligent and fearless defender of Liberalism, both public and private, and a pure, true, sympathetic, good woman. The signal service station located at this place is in latitude 37 deg. 40 min. N., and longitude 89 deg. 15 min. W. This is a natural wheat, clover, and fruit country. Thousands of bushels of wheat, apples, peaches, etc., are annually shipped from this and adjoining counties. But the amount of small fruits—strawberries, raspberries, etc.—that is shipped to Chicago and other Northern cities is immense. Public sentiment on the Sunday question is very different here from what it is in Pennsylvania. Go through this country any Sunday during the berry season (May and June) and you will see hundreds of men, women, and children busy picking berries, others casing them, and still others hauling them to the nearest station on the Illinois Central railroad. One hundred teams laden with strawberries is by no means an overestimate of what is often seen on Sunday in the little village of Makanda. Sunday believers call it a work of necessity. The Sunday observance seems here to be regarded as a private, personal matter, and all seem willing that each has his own views and carries them out without molestation, which is about the right view of the question, and very different from that advocated by the Hardshell God-in-the-Constitutionists, Scotch-Irish Covenanters, and United Presbyterian bigots of western Pennsylvania and elsewhere. Religion here seems to be rather a secondary matter. At worst it is only a surface trouble. It seldom attacks the vital organs, and, therefore, they don't "hav it bad." Sunday picnics, fishing, and innocent games are in order, and no one seems to think it wrong. Hell-fire is rarely mentioned in the pulpits, yet the people are orderly, accommodating, and kind, and seem less scheming and dishonest than some communities which are much more religious. Hav you read Talmage's last sermon (June 2d)? It seems a curious pity that a God who hears the prayers of nearly all the miscreant murderers that are hanged in the country would not hear those for the poor "young Infidel." It was too bad for death to breathe that cold breath in his face this hot weather. Is he never going to stop preaching that infamous lie about the horrors of Infidel death-beds? He knows that the Humboldts, the Darwins, the Garrisons, and Palmers die in peace. Why does he deliberately retail that stale old lie and slander, both of the living and the dead? Does he forget the doom his creed awards the false witness, and that "all liars shall hav their part in the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone?" Physicians tell us that Infidels die happier than Christians. And why not? The Materialist, having spent his life searching after truth, and trying to make his race wiser and happier, "wraps the drapery of his couch about him, and lies down" to a peaceful, dreamless, eternal sleep. The Spiritualist joins the loved ones who hav gone before to commence anew with them a higher, purer, happier life. Only the Christian is, logically, miserable in death. He has his angry God and horrid, burning hell, and he is never certain of his own salvation. And if he were, many of his best friends are in hell. Mr. Moody's good old grandmother, it seems, is there. And Talmage said in one of his sermons, speaking of outsiders, that "among them were some of his best friends. If protracted sickness were to visit his family, they would be among the watchers, and whoever might sleep, they would be awake until the dawn." Now, can Mr. Moody either liv or die happy, believing that his good, kind old grandmother is roasting and frying in red-hot fire and brimstone? Can Mr. Talmage die happy, believing that these kind, sympathizing, self-sacrificing watchers at his bedside would eternally writhe in hell-fire? I hav seen a hog (though it was rather a mean specimen of its race) appropriate to itself and a few favorits all the available comforts of the situation, and snug and warm in the nest grunt out its satisfaction, while its better fellows were shivering in the cold and the storm. And I thought it a good illustration in kind, but not in degree, of a happy Christian in heaven, while his grandmother and best and kindest friends were suffering the tortures of hell. W. W. WALKER.

Startling to a body's senses
Was the little boy next door.

If a window pane was shattered,
Or a missil cleaved the air,
If the street's repose was scattered—
Heads out-peeping everywhere—
Little need for explanation,
All had happened oft before;
Mite of terror and vexation
Was that little boy next door.

Cats and dogs by intuition
Knew of his approach and fled.
Jaunty was the hat's position
On his roguish, curly head.
As with bearing independent
He would bound the crossings o'er;
With good nature all resplendent
Was the little boy next door.

Brave, chivalric, and respectful
To the old who came his way,
With a sympathy regretful
Toward each beggar, day by day;
How the wild and tame were mingled
In his nature's bounteous store;
How my nerves were hourly tingled
By that little boy next door.

When, at sunset, homeward walking,
Once I missed the children's noise,
Marked their groups in whispers talking,
Leaving all their romping joys,
Saw the snow-white ribbons streaming
From the house I stopped before—
Tear-drops on my cheeks were gleaming
For the little boy next door.

The Value of Pure Air.

This may not be a very attractiv subject, but it seems possible that a discourse on "Pure Air" would be very instructiv and as acceptable as any.

The title might carry us far away from all sources of impurity, and imagination might lead us to the chief haunts of pure air—to the seaside or to the forests of evergreen trees, to the breezy headlands or to the mountain summit.

We might take into consideration some of the mighty operations of nature—the process by which the self-purification of the atmosphere is accomplished. We could watch its vapor gathering in mists in the valleys, rising into clouds, swept along by the winds, and descending in purifying streams in the form of rain.

We might try to learn something of the work that goes on in nature's vast laboratory of the sky—the destruction of organic matter by conversion into an oxide or gas, and how this is aided by the storm and the whirlwind, and by the stirring up of the aerial sea by cyclones, and by the electrical discharges, of which we hav such great proof in the lightning and in the thunder. Air and water, the wind and the storm, are the great purifiers of the universe.

The electricity and gases which are diffused in the atmosphere are constantly converting organic matter in the air into gas. In this manner the impurities are changed into the necessary gases of the air, and also for sustaining life by making the air pure. The winds are necessary to assist in diffusing the gases and bringing the organic matter in contact with the different gases. The fact that air, pure in quality and large in quantity, is needful to keep people in good health is a somewhat recent discovery, and it has been forced upon our attention by a great amount of suffering and loss of life in past time, and also at the present time many lives are lost by neglecting ventilation.

Absolute necessity has brought about ventilation. In modern times in crowded cities and armies there is always some savant to aid in the work of ventilation. Statistics show that the death rate is greatly lessened by proper ventilation, especially in hospitals, ships, barracks, etc., where close confinement and continual contact with each other causes the air breathed to become very impure, i.e., containing a greater amount of carbonic acid gas than oxygen.

In the army in the West Indies, about two score years ago, the men slept close together in barracks without ventilation, and as the consequence a large number of deaths took place from consumption, while in pure air and out of barracks the death rate was greatly lessened.

The record of death from this disease in the army affords a remarkable proof of the evil effects of the deficiency of pure air, and of the good effects of its plentiful supply. Carbonic acid gas, the impure gas of the air, is made up of several other forms of gases. The property which renders it so poisonous is oxygen in a highly activ, electric state, called ozone.

When ozone and the other gases are in the correct proportions, the carbonic acid gas is not so poisonous, but when they are out of the right proportions it is very poisonous. The impure air sinks to the bottom, and the pure air rises. Thus, a dog would feel the effects of the impure air, while a man would feel no inconvenience in breathing. This arises from the fact that carbonic acid gas is heavier than air, and sinks to the bottom of the room or cavern.

Another of nature's wise provisions for purifying the atmosphere is found in the taking up of carbonic acid gas by the vegetation. Compensation is here plainly shown, where man imparts carbonic acid gas and vegetation takes up carbonic acid gas.

Nature does her part in purifying the air, and when man builds close walls and excludes this air, he is not appreciating the work of nature. LEONORA STOCKINGER.

True to His Post.

General Elliott, when governor of Gibraltar, during the siege of that fortress was making a tour of inspection to see that all under his control was in order, when he suddenly came upon a German soldier, standing at his post silent and still; but he neither held his musket nor presented arms when the general approached.

Struck with the neglect, and unable to account for it, he exclaimed, "Do you know me, sentinel, or why do you neglect your duty?"

The soldier answered respectfully, "I know you well, general, and my duty also; but within the last few minutes two of the fingers of my right hand hav been shot off, and I am unable to hold my musket."

"Why do you not go and hav them bound up, then?" asked the general.

"Because," answered the soldier, "in Germany a man is forbidden to quit his post until he is relieved by another."

The general instantly dismounted from his horse. "Now, friend," he said, "giv me your musket, and I will relieve you. Go and get your wounds attended to."

The soldier obeyed, but went first to the nearest guard-house, where he told how the general stood at his post; and not till then did he go to the hospital and get his bleeding hand dressed. This injury completely unfitted him for activ service; but the news of it having reached England, whither the wounded man had been sent, King George III. expressed a wish to see him, and for his bravery made him an officer.

What the Little Ones Are Saying.

School-teacher: "Now, Bobby, spell needle." Little Bobby: "N-e-i-d-l-e, needle." School-teacher. "Wrong. There's no 'i' in needle." Bobby: "Well, 'taint a good needle then."

Teacher (in infant physiology class): "Johnny, how many bones hav you in your body?" Johnny (promptly): "Two hundred and four. I had thome more in my jaw latht winter. But I run into a bob goin' bumper, an' four of 'em tum out."

Our devil recently picked up on Washington street the following schoolboy's composition, which reads thusly: "On industry.—It is bad for a man to be idel. Industry is the best thing a man can hav, and a wife is the next. Profits and kings desired it long and dide without the site. The end."

"Country boys are not such squash-heads as they sometimes look," said the sociable drummer at the Broezel House. "One day last week I was out riding with a fellow who seemed to think it his mission to say or do something smart every minute. Presently we overtook a barefoot urchin driving a cow home from pasture, and my companion reined up the horse and spoke to him, saying, 'Say, my little man, what time will it be at 6 o'clock this afternoon?' Without a moment's hesitation the lad answered: 'Twill be bedtime for hens and fools. You're not a hen, but 'twill be your bedtime all the same.'"

Correspondence.

DENVER, COL., May 30, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My papa reads THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I thought I would write a letter for the first time. I hav a doll and her name is Laura, and she is one year old. My papa is the editor of the Arbitrator. I hav two brothers—one is three years and the other is nine years. We hav one nice dog and his name is Jim. I had a black kitty and my Uncle Haller took it to the farm. I read the Children's Corner, and like it very much. I hope I will see this in print. I am a little girl seven years old. I guess I will close for this time. From

MOUND CITY, MO., June 7, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav not written to the Corner for three years, so I am going to write a few lines. I am thirteen years old. My father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. I like to read the Corner very much. I was going to school, but it is out now. It has just been raining, and the weather is quite damp. The roses are in bloom. I hav been gathering them—they are very pretty. I told you about my cat the other time I wrote to you, but I hav not got any kitty now. I had the same one that I told you about three years ago, but it died last spring. We hav no dog, either. We hav a little Indian pony; we call him Comanch. He is black with one white foot. Well, my letter is getting long. I will close.

Yours forever, JENNIE SHUCK.

SHANES CROSSINGS, O., May 30, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav seen no letter from this county and I thought I would write and let the young Agnostics know that there were investigators living in Ohio as well as in other states. I liv on a farm and hav plenty of work to do, so I do not go to school any. Father has taught me to read and write, and has advanced me in other branches so that I can go to high school next summer. I must tell my little friends what I work at. I hav a beautiful thoroughbred colt, and in the morning I giv her two turns of our half-mile track, while father drives Redcloud by her side, and in the afternoon I am on the track again by the side of young Cruiser. In my next letter I will tell you how I bought my colt, and how fast she can run, and about my large uncle trying to buy her of me. My age is twelve years, and to hear me talk you would think I was John Sullivan, but I only weigh fifty pounds. Father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER since 1871, and I read all of it and admire the cartoons very much. I will stop writing for this time, remaining

Your true little friend,
SOLOMON PEAROE KING.

OAK MILLS, KAN., May 29, 1889.

MISS WIXON, Kind Friend: As it is raining and I cannot work, I will write you a brief letter. In the first place, I will name a few interesting and valuable pamphlets which I hav just been reading. William Denton's discourse on "Who are Christians?" is an able and unanswerable little work, and I wish all the Christians in the world could read it and find out the true character of their religion. This book closes with the following: "Instead of Christians, let us hav whole-souled, well-developed men and women, who will do right because right doing is best for humanity. Instead of Christian ministers let us hav human ministers—men bound by no creed, tied to no church, cursed by no Bible; men who will simply ask, What does nature teach? and, having learned this, seek to impress the truth on the minds of their fellows." I just finished reading "The Impeachment of Christianity," by Francis E. Abbot, and think it is one of the most able and eloquent little speeches of which Freethought can boast. This little book closes with the beautiful words, "In the name of human intelligence, of human virtue, of the human heart, of human freedom, of humanitarian religion, I seriously and earnestly impeach Christianity before the tribunal of the humanity it still continues to outrage and enslave. Impeach it in the name of that which is higher than itself, not lower—in the name of truth, of morality, of love, of liberty, of God; and I summon it to answer at the bar of humanity, its rightful judge, that it may clear itself of the high crimes and misdemeanors of which I accuse it, or else submit to the sentence of just condemnation pronounced against it by the public opinion of civilized mankind."

I hav also read a little pamphlet entitled, "Which is Right, Science or Religion?" by J. W. Curts, of St. Louis. It is an interesting work and clearly proves that science is right. He truly says, "All priests and preachers who teach the immortality of the soul or spirit and the existence of a personal God should either prove their assertions by scientific methods, or tell their congregations that theology or religion is simply based upon imagination or a supposition, and not upon knowledge." I advise everybody to get a copy of this work. Among other works that I hav been reading are W. S. Bell's "Conflict Between Christianity and Civilization," James Parton's "Taxation of Church Property," Annie Besant's "Fruits of Christianity," and "Secular Morality."

Chauncey Depew's centennial oration is very eloquent, but it is uncomplete, because he left out the bright name of Thomas Paine, a name that should be honored and cherished by every liberty-loving person the wide world over. I always thought that Chauncey Depew was loyal to his country and her brave defenders, but a man who does not appreciate the noble services of Thomas Paine and honor his great name is not a loyal man.

Well, as I hav written a longer letter than I expected to, I will close with best wishes to you all. Fraternally, GEO. J. REMSBURG.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.
A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.
Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

Protoplasm.

Take the microscope and look
  Down on any living tissue,
Lo! before you like a book
  Lies the cell; and from it issue
Others, and in all we trace
  Viscous globules, each one has 'em;
You're of life the very base,
    Protoplasm!

If I take a single drop,
  You're in such a strange condition
That your movements never stop,
  As if guided by volition.
Ardently we watch you whirl,
  Science breeds enthusiasm;
You're as giddy as a girl,
    Protoplasm!

Every blade of grass, each flower,
  All that own a life organic,
Every man that livs this hour,
  Boasting of his thews Titanic—
Looking backward, we can see
  Over life, as o'er a chasm,
How all sprang at first from thee,
    Protoplasm!

Thus it seems to thee we owe
  All we are and all we may be;
Man, the microscope says so,
  Was a protoplastic baby.
Here's your health, then, since you bring
  Life, that physiologic spasm;
But for thee I could not sing,
    Protoplasm!

—H. Savile Clarke in the St. James Gazette.

A Sea Song.

Hurrah for the sea, where the chowders be,
  And the sculpin winds his horn!
Where the star-fish shine through the spumy brine,
  And the mammoth oysters yawn!
For the barnacle blows and the conger crows
  As we chase the prickled prawn.

Then roll out the captain's gig, my lads,
  Let the bobstay harnessed be!
With the breeze abaft, and fore and aft,
  We'll drive o'er the wind-whipped sea.

Hear the bo's'n shout: "Let the port hatch out!
  Haul the affidavits taut!
Like snowy crowds spread the white, white shrouds,
  Where the dead night's gleam is caught!
Belay the keel till the compass heel
  And the water line runs short!'

The main sheet fills with the mad monsoon,
  We hav furled the fore crosstree,
And so tightly laced the vessel's waist,
  As we skim o'er the creamy sea.

The sea-gulls shriek from the for'ard peak,
  As the shrimps go prancing by,
And the mermaids kiss the whistling buoy,
  While the urchin pipes his eye;
The dog-fish bark at the tipsy shark,
  And the halibut joins the cry.

Then cheer, mate, cheer, as the good ship speeds,
  Till we make the hawser gee!
For the wind in the sale blows a martingale,
  And we plow the furrowed sea.

Ho, binnacle, fly from the capstan high!
  Make the mizzen scuppers fast!
By the lanyard's light through the nasty night
  We will scud before the mast;
For the breeze is a lee and the rover is free,
  And a schooner of beer has passed.

Hurrah for the ship! Hurrah for the crew!
  Merry, merry boys are we—
And our course is pressed for the glowing west
  As we rise on the yeasty sea.

SAVAGEISM.

Rev. M. J. Savage, the Boston Unitarian divine, discoursed St. Patrick's day on Ingersollism. This unorthodox exponent of Hub culture paid the colonel high compliments for oratory and honesty, saying that among all Ingersoll's utterances there was not one but what was noble; that his ideas were those of Hume, Voltaire, Paine, Franklin, and the heroic founders of the American republic. I query—what more could he ask of a man? Yet, Mr. Savage said he differed from Ingersoll in important points, finishing his discourse, as the Boston Herald states, with "a beautiful contrast between the gospel of despair and the gospel of hope." What can editor or preacher tell of immortality more than the lawyer or a newsboy?

THE BLESSED HARDSHELL BAPTISTS.

"The act supplementary to an act" of Senator Blair, barring a slight criticism, is a fine sarcasm, and a document that ought to be introduced in Congress as a bill, to show the ultimate tendency of Blair's bungle.

The insertion of the blessed hardshell Baptists, as a factor in the temporal tribunal of faith, is all right if meant to show that they might lay claim to a part in the jurisdiction of religion, but it is a matter of fact that they not only never hav, but, on the contrary, hav ever protested against the interference of piety and politics. Indeed, Freethought owes much to the Baptist sects, from Roger Williams to Elias Smith and Father Foss, for its opportunity and encouragement, and immersionists hav been duly damned in return by the obstreperous orthodox, as the cursed hardshell Baptists.

A STILL HUNT.

When Nelson Hunt, of the Milwaukee Military Home, goes on a still hunt for truth he always brings home his game. His little letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 23d, hit the stag in the heart. There are Spiritualists and Spiritualists, as there are Protestants and Protestants, and Liberals and Liberals. As Protestants in their fight against the Catholics claimed the right of personal interpretation of scripture, they opened the door for the armies of liberty. Spiritualists hav gone farther, and maintained that they found heaven's gates ajar and threw them wide open. Whatever be the verity of the vision, it is a fact that their belief is a fearful blow to arbitrary authority, and so long as both their money and brains are important factors in the Secular movement, Materialists will look better to do more and say less.

OTHER PEOPLE'S MONEY AND BRAINS.

A high-toned church man here in Lynn has made confession to speculating in falling stocks with the bank's surplus. Maybe the confession was good for his soul, yet that did not save him from arrest and investigation. He should put in a plea to the Christian court that "Jesus paid it all," and giv the directors a check on the Bank of Kingdom Come. Professors of piety may be expected to be derelict in business; religion makes them happy now, and it will be all lovely in the sweet by and bye, when their victims roast on Satan's gridiron. Also two good deacons hav taken out a patent to another man's invention, discharged him from their employ, and threaten to sue him for manufacturing his own machines. Verily, verily!

There is much ado made over those who remand other people's money to their own private treasury, but little is said of those who garner from other people's brains, having themselvs but barely the wit to steal the fruits of somebody else's genius. Many an inventor has died in a madhouse, whilst some one without originality enough to make two tubs of a barrel built double-turreted mansions with the profits on the pauper's handiwork.

"Robert Elsmere," a four-hundred page volume, written in England, plus Gladstone's criticism, are both offered as a premium to the purchaser of a twenty-five cent cake of soap! It takes brains to sell soap. When such bargains in books and soap are made, the conjunction is conditioned on purloining the output of other people's thinking machines, which shows the need of an international copyright.

"PERICLES" PULVERIZED.

What is "Pericles" posing for? Is he ambitious to enroll his name with Mohammed and Joe Smith as the founder of a faith? That cannot be, as he is too modest to tell his true name. What is there about his "Monos" that is any better than Deos, Dynspater, Jehovah, or Mumbo-Jumbo? One God is as good as another until his existence is proved and character verified. When the old superstitions hav been silenced, why originate others to put in their place? Perhaps "Pericles" thinks thus to satisfy stupidity. As well try to fill a bottomless bucket. Genius made the images of the gods in the age of the ancient and real Pericles; she makes steam engins, electric motors, and telegraphs to-day, enlisting the powers of the air as the servants of man.

An old Jew given to Canaanitish idolatry complained to the iconoclast, "Ye hav taken away my gods, and what hav I more?" "Pericles" takes away every god ever heard of and then dubiously dedicates another in their place. Who shall stand sponsor for the New God? "Pericles?" Who is he? This god-maker seems as reluctant to show himself or reveal his true name as was the God of Mount Horeb. Old Jehovah ought to be called the Most Horrid, in memento of the trick he played on Mr. Moses when those two sports were playing hide and seek. There be lords many and gods many. Some gods are like a china doll, some like a hero's statue, and some like a morning fogbank. According to the second Commandment, it can be no sin to worship Monos, the god of "Pericles," for "he," Monos, is made in the likeness of nothing in the heavens above, in the earth beneath, or in the waters under the earth.

Obituaries.

One of nature's noblest women has gone. Eliza J. Thompson, wife of the earnest and outspoken Liberal, James Thompson, of Shingle House, Pa., has left us, to solve the mystery of death. On the morning of May 26th the last farewell was said. The deceased had for the past two years suffered greatly from lung and throat disease. She had not quite reached the age of thirty-eight.

Always kind, patient, and hopeful, she was a woman who won love and respect from all walks of life—from the narrow way of narrow creeds as well as from the broad highways of tolerance. Although an earnest Liberal and a fearless advocate of whatever she considered the truth, her criticisms of error reflected only a desire to make better.

Wishing to die as she had lived, she requested that there be no religious services at her funeral—no formal words or prayers said in way of professional business by the representativ of a creed in which she had no faith—but named two friends who had known her long and well to pay such tributes to her memory as she had merited.

The following are extracts from the addresses at the funeral on the 26th, the first being from that of Capt. L. H. Kinney, of Shingle House, Pa.:

After many months of suffering, borne with remarkable patience, fortitude, and cheerfulness, she has passed to the other side of the river and entered the perfect rest which begins where the wearying struggle of this life ends. To those who knew her most intimately, no word of eulogy is needed to illustrate her virtues or portray the beautiful character she maintained. With a clear conception of propriety and right, she faltered not in duty, in whatever walk of life that duty appeared. Whether as daughter, sister, wife, mother, or friend, her life was blameless, spotless, true.

She loved the beautiful, admired the grand, and took nature into a close companionship. . . . In speaking recently of funeral rites, she said, "Giv me a yard of flowers rather than a mile of crape." With a broad tolerance and charity for the opinions of others, which she sought not to controvert or overthrow, she put no trust in creeds, but, looking up into the benign face of nature, saw and embraced the truth as she read it there. This was her guiding star, lighting her pathway in health, in decline, in sickness, and down to the river brink where she bade good-bye to the scenes of her early childhood and riper years.

Our sister wished to stay, not that she feared death or what may lie beyond it, but that she might still be with and serve the loved ones she has left behind. But the hand of the destroyer could not be stayed, and her passage over the river is accomplished.

Quoting some beautiful words of the "Master of Eloquence," Mr. Kinney closed with a poem and gave place to J. L. Allen, of Clara, Pa., who spoke as follows:

From long acquaintance, I can say that, for pure unselfishness, she has few equals. I believe that her life was, to a greater degree than that of any other person I ever met, devoted to making others happy. . . . Frank and outspoken in her nature, she naturally despised hypocrisy and deceit in any form. Her idea of religious duty was to make others happier and better while here in this world. She believed that such a course was always the best possible preparation for the future. She was humane and kindly by nature, and could never accept any belief that endless cruelty or suffering formed a part of. . . . But, though positiv in her own convictions, she never expressed or seemed to feel the least unkindness toward those who honestly differed with her in opinions—believing that honesty and sincerity are not found alone in one faith, but are common to all.

She had no fear of death. . . . Having never done a wrong, or wantonly made unhappy a single human being, can anyone say why she should fear the future? Her life and death seem to teach this fact—that it is not any one particular faith or belief that makes one strong and able to do their whole duty in life. . . . But that it is the honesty and sincerity of the individual.

The world is better for her having lived—all her friends are better for having known her friendship. There was no purer, nobler woman.

Mrs. Eva A. H. Barnes, of Clara, Pa., read a fine tribute to the departed soul, and Mrs. Ella A. Glines, of the same place, followed with a poem by Lizzie Doten—"Rest Thou in Peace."

Thus music and kind words were mingled in memory of the dead, and in sympathy with the bereaved ones she has left to mourn. How much better than hypocritical, unfeeling form dictated by fashion in honor of a superstition of dishonor!

The advanced character of the services startled the Christians of this vicinity, and many were indignant—before they thought. But they will think. The more they think, too, the more appropriate will these sincere, heartfelt services appear; and as they hav to turn more and more of memory's pages to find the face of the dead—as the lessons of life are learned more thoroughly—they will come to realize better what the world has lost by her dying.

N. L. A.

DIED.—At his home in Greencastle, Ia., June 7, 1889, Daniel Swank, aged 62 years 8 months and 17 days.

Thus ends the career of a good man and exemplary citizen. Uncle Dan, as he was familiarly called, was widely and honorably known, having lived in Jasper county nearly thirty years. He was truthful and honest, kind and charitable, in word and action, and generous to a fault. He had a broad and comprehensiv knowledge of all things of general interest, and good scholarly attainments. He loved to discuss scientific questions, and was familiar with the theories and writings of Huxley, Tyndall, Darwin, and Spencer. He was an excellent biblical scholar, although repudiating the divine inspiration theory of the scriptures. His only enemies were those who hated him because of his opinions on what is absolutely unknowable, i.e., God and immortality. And those he rather pitied than despised because they denied him the right to think for himself. He had no faith in the supernatural, and believed there were natural causes for everything. It was his oft-repeated request that no orthodox preacher should officiate at his funeral, and his wishes were complied with. This request was not made through any personal dislike of the clergy, but because he knew that no minister could preach a funeral discourse over his remains and be true to himself or the tenets of his faith and afford his friends any comfort. He believed it presumptuous of any man to speak authoritativly of the future and hence forbade it. He believed that the ultimate destiny of all things is governed by natural laws fixed and immutable, and perfectly safe in the hands of that power from whom all things emanate. So safe, indeed, that no human hands or mind should dare to interfere.

He was philosophical and met death calmly and serenely. If it was but the entrance to another existence he did not fear the change. If it was an eternal sleep he would not repine. Conscience had been his master and reason his guide, and he died without a murmur.

A large number of neighbors and friends assembled at the funeral. Mr. W. M. Boyde took charge of the funeral and spoke briefly and feelingly of the life and excellent traits of character of the deceased. H. M. FISK.

DIED.—In Terrell, Tex., June 8, 1889, after a lingering illness of several months, Mrs. Ellen B. Johnson, aged 47 years.

Having lived a life of purity, innocence, and usefulness, she felt the need of no rites and ceremonies, no creed or rituals, the consolations of no so-called religion, to smooth her passage to the tomb, or the intervention of no priestly office to insure her future well-being. Her head knew no misgivings; her heart no distrust. Enmeshed in early life in the coils of superstition, by the exercise of her reflectiv powers and rare good sense, conjoined with great goodness of heart and amiability of character, she had long since come forth from the vale of superstition and credulity, and ascended to the serene hights of wisdom, where, bathed in eternal love and goodness, she looked down with melting pity upon the dupe of priestcraft and the victims of bigotry.

Feeling from the first she could not get well, she expressed no desire to stay the event when the supreme moment came. She closed her own eyes, crossed her hands on her peaceful breast over a heart too pure to doubt, too loving to fear, and sweetly and gently breathed her life away, respected and beloved by all who knew her.

"I was with Booth," the fakir said.
Said the amateur: "Say no more,
But come with me to my father's house
And partake of his goodly store.
And say, do you think I can get a place

For I think I would like to take the stage,
And my father says I may go.
For I can play Romeo almost as well
As anyone in the land,
And the local press and the people say
That my Hamlet is perfectly grand.
Say, you must see our amateur club,
For it is quite sure to be great,
And I should hav been on the road long ago,
But my modesty bade me wait.'
The fakir slowly turned and said:
"I pray you tell me no more,
For I was with Booth, and blacked his boots
In eighteen sixty-four."
The amateur then said never a word,
But beat with his fists full sore
The fakir old, who blacked Booth's shoes
In eighteen sixty-four.

I verily believe that the great good which has been effected in the world by Christianity has been largely counteracted by the pestilent doctrin on which all the churches hav insisted, that honest disbelief in their more or less astonishing creeds, is a moral offense, indeed a sin of the deepest dye, deserving and involving the same future retribution as murder and robbery.—Professor Huxley.

If it stood alone, it would be almost sufficient to plead, as justification for heresy, the approach toward equality and liberty for the utterance of all opinions achieved because of growing unbelief.—Bradlaugh.

The destruction of the belief in witchcraft and of religious persecution; the decay of those ghastly notions concerning future punishment which for centuries diseased the imaginations and embittered the character of mankind; the emancipation of suffering nationalities; the abolition of the belief in the guilt of honest error, which paralyzed the intellectual, and of the asceticism which paralyzed the material, progress of mankind, may be justly regarded among the greatest triumphs of mankind.—Lecky's History of Rationalism.

I hav endeavored to establish four leading propositions, which, according to my view, are to be deemed the basis of the history of civilization. They are: 1. That the progress of mankind depends on the success with which the laws of phenomena are investigated, and on the extent to which a knowledge of those laws is diffused. 2. That before such investigation can begin, a spirit of skepticism must arise, which, at first aiding the investigation, is afterward aided by it. 3 That the discoveries thus made, increase the influence of intellectual truths, and diminish, relativly, not absolutely, the influence of moral truths; moral truths being more stationary than intellectual truths, and receiving fewer additions. 4. That the great enemy of this movement, and therefore the great enemy of civilization, is the protectiv spirit; by which I mean the notion that society cannot prosper, unless the affairs of life are watched over and protected at nearly every turn by the state and the church; the state teaching men what they are to do, and the church teaching them what they are to believe.—Buckle's History of Civilization.

Almost every scientific advance or social reform has been opposed by Christians. We could mention that when the art of printing was discovered, the bishop of London said, "We must in some way destroy this infernal art, or it will some day destroy us." We could quote John Bright, who said, "The bishops of the church of England hav seldom aided legislation in the interest of humanity;" Macaulay, who says, "The church of England for a hundred and fifty years was the steady enemy of public liberty;" Lange, who says: "Education and enlightenment, as a rule, go hand in hand with the decrease of the clergy."—*Robert C. Notes and Clippings.

It is suggested that Mr. Wanamaker's next move will be to forbid the carrying of Monday newspapers by the mail service because they are mostly made up on Sunday.

There is a claim in the patent office for a patent on the Lord's prayer, the specifications being that the repetition of the same "rapidly in a loud tone of voice" will cure stammering.

The World thinks that John Sherman may be waiting to see what 1892 may hav in store for him. Conversing with a friend recently on religious matters he said: "I believe in God, the almighty. That is as far as I hav got."

M. Sopinard, the great French anthropologist, has been led by the shape of the leg bones of the "men of Spy" to the conclusion that these remote ancestors of the human race had their lower extremities half bent, like those anthropoid apes that inhabit trees.

The heathen Chinese hav not been slow in contributing toward the relief of the sufferers at Johnstown. In Pittsburgh they raised $120, with which they bought supplies and sent them on to the stricken city. Over $300 was raised by the pagan Chinamen in this city.

A statement made by Mr. James Irvine, of Liverpool, was quoted in the House of Lords the other day. Mr. Irvine said that twenty thousand tons of bad rum and gin are sold every year along two hundred and fifty miles of the West African coast by not over a dozen firms, "the members of which are excellent men, and many of them, I believe, sincere Christians."

The San Francisco Jewish Times says: "I am grieved to learn that the holy father shut himself up three days in the Vatican during the celebration attending the unveiling of the statue to Giordano Bruno. He considered the act sacrilegious, and deemed it his duty to pray for the heretics. This is merciful compared with the action of the pope who deemed it his duty to prey upon Bruno."

A Kansas editor in drawing a pen sketch of Senator Ingalls writes: "Mr. Ingalls is not very pretty, his hair is very gray, and he is exceedingly thin and would make a good clothes-prop or living illustration of the Dr. Tanner theory. His legs resemble a pair of breech-loading single-barrel guns thrust into gun-bags. It is a mystery to us how he manages to carry such a big head full of eighteen-carat brains around on such an emaciated set of underpinnings."

A lens for seeing when under water is described by its discoverer as producing an effect which is both astonishing and delightful. It givs distinct vision of objects twenty or thirty feet off, the eye's loss of extended sight when under water being because an entirely different focus is required. The spectacles which provide this can be made by putting two watch glasses of three-quarters of an inch diameter and an inch radius back to back, or with the concavities outward.

The Italians of this city are determined that the monument in honor of Christopher Columbus, which they are preparing to raise here, shall be a work of art worthy of Italy. They say that in our parks and squares we hav statues of two or three Germans and an Englishman and a Scotchman and other Europeans, besides Americans, but that the great Italian to whom we owe our country has been neglected. The Columbus monument is likely to be a majestic pile, and an honor to the Central park. Both Italian and American sculptors hav been invited to offer designs for it.

Some of the reverend Sam Jones's pulpit gems are these: "I can put one hundred of these little Infidels in my vest pocket and never know they are there, except I felt for my toothpick. A high license preacher won't be in hell ten minutes before the devil will hav him saddled and bridled, riding him around and exhibiting him as a curiosity. If any one here don't believe what I say, and will tell me so to my face, I will giv him a hat and some dentist a job of replacing his teeth, from the wisdom tooth down. A preacher who does not hold family prayer ain't fit to be pastor of a litter of pups." The reverend Mr. Jones is a Christian.

On account of his cases in court, Colonel Ingersoll has not yet been able to go off on his summer vacation, but his day is at hand. He will not betake himself to the solitudes of the forest, or the quiet shores of the rolling sea, or the lonely summits of the lofty mountains, or the peaceful shades of an isolated farmhouse. He is fond of Saratoga; he likes hotel life; he enjoys plenty of society; he takes pleasure in seeing people merry. Colonel Ingersoll's baldness makes him look older than he is. He has not yet reached the fifty-sixth year of his age, and he keeps himself in a physical condition that is marvelous to behold.—Sun.

The appeal to Parliament in the Nineteenth Century for June against the enactment of a woman suffrage law, and signed by Mrs. Humphry Ward and others, has had the effect of producing a flood of papers on the subject in nearly all the English reviews for July. Most of them favor woman suffrage, though the other side is also represented. The London Times is out against the movement, and it looks as though a fair start had been made for a prolonged discussion. Among the women who sign a paper in opposition to Mrs. Ward and her sympathizers are Frances Power Cobbe and the wives of the archbishops of Canterbury and York and others of distinction, forming a much more formidable list than the anti-suffragists presented.

The Freeman's Journal, speaking of the doctrin of election or predestination, says that the Presbyterians wish "to alter the doctrins which their sturdy forefathers considered the 'faith once delivered to the saints,' and to set aside the very word of God, as they conceived it, in order to please the multitude." But, says the Freeman's Journal: "It is certainly true that if there be an infinit God, then everything of creation must hav been settled by him from (what we call in our limited language) eternity. Not a single hair of our heads, not a grain of sand, not a drop of water but whose destiny has been settled eternally by the being who described himself not as one who was, or will be, but as the 'I am.' For him there is no past, there is no future. This is the doctrin of predestination, and if anyone can pick a flaw in it, without denying God, he is welcome to try his hand."

The Domain of King Cole.

A tale of the Differentiation of Human Morals, illustrating the perversity of human nature. Respectfully commended to Senator Blair, Frances Willard, and their friends.

"To him who hath a good digestion, there is eke a clear conscience, and when two inches of fat cover the mid rib, there comes concern for the future to no man." Thus wrote the sage proverb maker for old King Cole, after he had spent many years in observing men and manners in the island of Anser. Now, the king had a good digestion. Night after night he went to his bed in a condition of mind and body such as to make him believe that he was carrying his head, royal crown and all, under his arm. Yet each morning he rose with a brain in which no cobwebs were floating, and attacked his chops and 'alf and-'alf with the fresh enthusiasm of an escaped convict. He had, moreover, the identical deposit of adipose tissue to which the proverb-maker refers. Thus it came to pass that, with no questionings of an inward monitor about the way in which he was treating his subjects and with no consideration of the future, the jolly monarch never suspected the great revolution which was to follow his reign.

The times of King Cole preceded by an indefinit period the era of the Great Reform in Monarchs. In those days kings did not spend their time writing innocent books of travel, nor did they head subscription lists. Princes had not learned to lay the corner-stones of orphan asylums, and to open mechanical shows. The chief advantage in being a ruler of men lay in the fact that one's amusements were not likely to be interfered with, either by a stricture of the exchequer or by any statute in such cases made and provided. If one had a fondness for six meals a day and unlimited liquor, as did King Cole, it was a decided convenience to hav a whole island full of subjects supplying the wherewithal; if a young man enjoyed sowing wild oats, as was the case with Prince Dimples, it was very pleasant to find the bag always full and no one standing in the way. It is not strange that both the king and the prince lived quite up to their privileges. This is a sphere of existence where every being does pretty much as he is allowed to do by the others.

The reign of King Cole is said by the chroniclers to hav been a merry time. The monarch himself was one of those exuberant souls who wish their pleasures shared by everyone. If any subject of the king failed to get drunk and enjoy himself, certainly his majesty was not to blame. There was plenty of good liquor to be had for the asking. Under such circumstances it was hard to find a satisfactory reason for not being merry. One of the last measures discussed by the king and his parliament before the law-making power passed from their hands was an act making it a misdemeanor for any subject to be sober and orderly in a time of general celebration, it being held that such conduct was prima facie evidence of a disposition on his part to get the better of his fellows.

It was, however, only among the courtiers and in the royal establishment that the old king's idea of a merry existence could be carried out to perfection. The councillors were a lot of sad dogs, who had for many years forgotten what it was like to be sober. Official capacity was gaged by number of bottles. At the head of the ministry was the earl of Jaggs, who could hold his own even to the extent of helping to put his majesty to bed. The royal favorits were all fat, and had noses of a hue to call forth many witty gibes from the monarch whose throne they surrounded. Their prevailing malady was gout; and Flip, the king's jester, frequently got off his best things with his face drawn up in a comical knot over the pain in his toes.

As he came to advance in years and increase in weight, King Cole found the business of governing his people more and more of a nuisance. At times it interfered in an exasperating fashion with the serious affairs of his life. Whether a law was decided upon or not—whether a judgment was rendered or postponed—these were small matters after all, compared to a cold dinner and too long a time between drinkings.

On one occasion, after the king, during a period of enforced sobriety, had transacted a quantity of accumulated business, he remarked to the burghers around him: "Why am I tormented in my old age with this useless labor? My ancestors hav been making laws for you these many centuries. Surely you must hav enough on hand now to last through the rest of my reign. If you want any more, get them up and pass them yourselvs; I will not be bothered with them."

The people acted upon this hint. The leading spirit among them was a man by the name of Bluenose, who had gained a certain kind of ascendency over his fellows by the rigid correctness of his life. Anyone who could be depended upon to remain sober when everybody else was drunk must naturally hav wielded a deal of influence in the domain of King Cole. A College of Lawmakers was chosen, and Bluenose assumed by common consent his place at its head. At first the acts passed by this body were laid before the king for his signature, but as it became more and more difficult to find a time when he could write his name without falling asleep over it, this ceremony was finally abandoned.

This was the consummation for which the king had devoutly hoped. As he saw the people interesting themselvs in the election of delegates, and the latter gathering together and earnestly attacking the hard labor of government, he chuckled with glee over his own shrewdness.

"I should not be surprised," he remarked, in a burst of frankness to my Lord Hic, who was first cork-puller to his majesty and a prime favorit, "if these people, with a little experience, should learn to govern themselvs quite as well as I could do the work myself."

At this quaint idea the courtiers burst into a laugh, and my Lord Hic, hastily filling the king's glass with wine, remarked: "Your majesty is very dry."

"Let us drink the sack of the nation," said Flip, the jester, raising his mug of frothing liquor, "and we care not who make its laws."

"As a reward for the generous assistance which my people hav given me," cried the king, "I herewith decree a grand national holiday, continuing through the rest of my reign, during which no one shall be required to do any work, and endless feasting and drinking shall prevail."

A loud shout went up from the court. The king's health was drunk amid wild huzzaing and clashing of glasses. Only Flip, the fool, stood silent and sad, his head hanging down as though it were weighted with a heavy thought. Him the king noticed, and instantly commanded silence.

"What there, varlet!" he exclaimed; "how comes it that when all my people are happy and rejoicing, you alone, who draw a good salary for being merry, are downcast?"

"I was merely thinking, your majesty," answered the fool, and he sighed long and deep.

"Of what are you thinking?" asked the monarch, while all the court stood breathless; "is it of the national holiday which I hav decreed?"

"Nay, sire," quoth the fool, shaking his head with a melancholy jangle of the bells on his cap; "I did but forecast the national headache on the long morrow after your majesty's reign is over, and I bethought me of the national repentance, and worse than all, of the national good resolutions!"

As the fool spoke the courtiers turned pale, and at the last words there was a visible shudder. The king was silent, as if in mighty thought.

"Hold!" cried the proverb-maker; "to him that is truly happy there is no to-morrow."

"You hav spoken well," said the king, turning to the sage, "and I hereby decree that my people be made so joyful that they shall never think of a time to come after my reign."

Freed from the impedimenta of responsibility, old King Cole and his court continued the unsteady tenor of their way, becoming more riotously jolly and more thoroughly regardless of consequences from year to year. The demoralization extended to every branch of the public service, including even the royal guard, who grew so fat that their commander dared not order a double-quick, lest he should decimate the line with apoplexy. The lackeys of the royal establishment stood around as sleepy and useless as so many dodos. Only the ratcatchers had to be thoroughly awake and vigilant, and to their numbers frequent additions were made at the urgent request of the earl of Jaggs and others of the older members of the court.

No one paid any attention to the bringing-up of little Dimples, the fat and jolly heir-apparent. He spent most of his time roaming about with a gang of young statute-breakers getting into and out of scrapes.

One night the feasting and revelry at the palace were at their highest, the fiddlers were playing their best, and the bowl was passing rapidly from mouth to mouth, when old King Cole made a sudden movement and opened his lips as if about to speak.

"Silence, all!" shouted the earl of Jaggs, and the uproar instantly subsided. The courtiers, who were, as usual at this time of the evening, unanimously drunk, except, perhaps, a few who in all conscience and decency ought to hav been, crowded around the throne to hear the royal utterance.

But the king did not speak. His lips opened wider and wider, and his eyes stared straight in front of him. From red his face changed to purple and then to black.

"Is your majesty ill?" cried my Lord Hic.

There was no answer, but the next instant, with a rattle and a chug, old King Cole pitched forward out of his throne and fell face downward on the floor. The royal crown leaped from its owner's head, and rolled in a drunken fashion through the crowd some distance away.

The court physician was stretched out on a settee in one corner of the room. Several of the courtiers ran to wake him, while the others turned the monarch over with a pull and a tug, as they might hav some huge jelly-fish.

"Bring water!" shouted some one, and Flip, the fool, wagging his head sadly, muttered to himself "Desperate cases, desperate remedies."

"If there were not so much fat," said the physician with a hiccough, laying his ear to the monarch's chest; "I can't hear his heart."

One of the bystanders stumbled over the crown and bent it with his foot. Looking around to see that he was unobserved, he kicked it into shape again, and then stepped up to the earl of Jaggs and placed it in his hand.

"The king is dead," said the physician, unsteadily rising to his feet.

"Long liv the king!" shouted the earl of Jaggs, waving the crown aloft. Then he turned and scanned the faces of those about him. "Where is Dimples?" he said; "find him and bring him here, some of you. He must be crowned without delay."

Sobered by the sudden calamity which had overtaken their monarch, the revelers started out in search of the young prince. He was not in the palace, nor anywhere about the royal grounds. As they ran through the streets of the capital, looking into all the wine-shops and gaming-rooms which the prince and his friends were wont to frequent, the courtiers spread the news everywhere of the death of the king, and a great crowd began to assemble in front of the palace. By daylight, the rabble had become so numerous and so noisy that, as the searchers tried to make their way back to the royal grounds, they found every avenue closed.

"Why does not some one order out the royal guard," they exclaimed, "fat and worthless choughs though they are, and hav the mob dispersed?"

But the royal guard was down in the wine-cellars underneath the kitchens, striving to distil courage from the contents of black bottles. The dead body of the king and his battered crown were in the possession of Bluenose and his associate Lawmaker, who had invaded the palace. The earl of Jaggs was locked up in a strong, dark closet, where real rats ran back and forth over his feet. Confusion and uproar had prevailed for a time, but this was succeeded by a decorum and good order little short of painful.

"Here is a fine ruffling of feathers," whispered Flip to himself, as he heard Bluenose addressing the people from the upper windows of the palace, and assuring them that henceforth they were to be their own rulers; "and all this is because the curly pate of little Dimples happened to be mislaid, so that we could not clap a crown upon it."

But where was the prince? My Lord Hic whispered to the other courtiers his conviction that Bluenose had made away with the heir-apparent. Naughty people are prone to think ill of those who are unusually virtuous, and even Bluenose could not escape suspicion. But in this particular matter they wronged him.

The prince was in a peculiar situation, and no one but himself knew it. On the night when apoplexy foreclosed on his father, he had been out with a number of his usual associates, all disguised so that they scarcely knew each other. They had just caught a police magistrate, and were preparing to hold him under a pump, when a contingent of the municipal guard, an organization under the control of the Lawmakers, came down upon them. They scattered like a flock of sparrows among whom a stone is tossed, and all managed to get away except Dimples, who had laughed himself quite out of breath at the fright of the magistrate.

His captors dragged him to the city jail, having no suspicion of who he was, and there he was thrust in with a lot of tattered vagrants and drunken disturbers of the peace, to undergo trial and sentence before the very magistrate whom he had sought to put under the pump. Thus several weeks passed before the heir to the domain of King Cole managed to appear in public. By that time the revolution was entirely consummated, and the control of the government was irrevocably in the hands of Bluenose and the reform party.

The great undertaking of the Differentiation of Morals had begun in the island of Anser.

"We all understand," said Bluenose to the half-a-dozen members of the College of Lawmakers who formed the controling ring of that body, "that there is a great deal of sinfulness among these people, and, as they propose to govern themselvs, it is our duty to devise laws for their immediate correction and to take care that such laws are rigidly executed. Every measure being presented to the people for a majority vote to confirm, there is no possibility that injustice will be done. By the application of proper means, I believe it will come to pass, in a short space of time, that the subjects of King Cole, drunken and vicious though they were during his rule, will become, under their own self-government, one of the most thoroughly moral people to be found on earth."

Then said Rhamrod, the stern and vigilant lieutenant of Bluenose: "I can find no reason for the existence of vice in a nation which is correctly governed. A man's act is either right or wrong; if it is right, he should be encouraged to repeat it; if wrong, he should receive instant and uncompromising punishment. We do no wrong ourselvs, why should we allow it in others?"

"If we alone were to administer the government," said another of the circle, the righteous Grimmugg, "we should doubtless soon bring all these malefactors to terms; but can these people be depended upon to pass the laws which we offer? For myself, I would like to see it made a punishable offense even to thump the head of a watchman; yet, methinks, with all the youth of the land voting for their ancient prerogativ, such a law would fail to win a majority."

"It is the function of us who are made leaders," remarked Bluenose, "to educate the moral sensibilities of the people to a higher standard. Everything cannot be accomplished at once. First let us see to it that existing laws are executed and that the more serious offenses are invariably followed up with punishment. In time we may proceed to a complete suppression, not only of all that is wrongful, but also of those things which tend to make men idle and useless to the community."

In this mild but insidious fashion did the Lawmakers commence their work of reform, and great changes immediately began to come to pass in the domain of King Cole. New courts were established everywhere, and all offenders to public peace and morality were tried before stern and pitiless magistrates. Justice no longer trod her way with unsteady gait and delivered her dicta with a hiccough, as she had done under the old king, but was bolt upright and vigilant. The police authorities became preternaturally honest, and refused even the most secret bribes. There was a unanimous and a complete reform among all public officials—except, of course, those who were employed in the custom-house.

The people at large, becoming absolutely giddy with the rapture of sudden virtue, passed without question a number of laws put forth by Bluenose and his colleagues. Finding no opposition, the Lawmakers pushed through several measures tending very strongly toward their plan of ultimate moral perfection. Merrymaking in public places was forbidden, dog-fights were prohibited, and the young men who broke street-lamps got ten days. One by one, the amusements popular under the old régime were checked off, and the old-time subjects and disciples of King Cole found it harder and harder to keep out of jail.

It was a new law on the subject of vagrancy, by which every able-bodied citizen was compelled to go to work, which caused the most serious inconvenience to the former habitués of the courts. When Dimples, after his release, came back to his father's palace, he found that the building was used for courts and city offices, and that the jolly companions of the old king had all fled—no one knew whither. As he wandered down the avenue after making this melancholy discovery, the prince, by good luck, happened upon Flip, the jester to his father's court, no longer wearing a parti-colored doublet and hose, with cap and bells, but attired in a plain suit of inky black.

"What! is it Dimples?" cried the fool, joyously; "we hav believed you dead, my masters of the court and I." He seized the hand of the prince and held it in a firm grip with both his own, while the tears rolled down his cheeks.

"Do you weep?" exclaimed Dimples; "what unprofessional conduct is this for a jester!"

"You misjudge me," said Flip, drawing himself up in a dignified manner; "I hav reformed and am no longer the fool that I once was. Tears, indeed, hav become very professional with me, for I am now apprenticed to an undertaker."

"By my father's pipe and punch-bowl," cried the prince, "I cannot comprehend this jest!"

"There is no jest, I assure you," said the other. "Look you," he went on, in a whisper, "hav you got a job?"

"No," said the bewildered Dimples.

"Then get one without delay, or you will go to jail with the other vagrants. Come with me; I know a tooth-puller who wants an assistant to hold people for him."

"I would rather not do that," said the prince, dubiously. "Where are all my father's friends? I will see them before I decide what work I will do, if I must work."

"They are gone, I know not where," said Flip, shaking his head sadly; "the earl of Jaggs has opened a taproom, where I hav heard many of them congregate; but Bluenose and the Lawmakers hold that all drinking is evil and tending to produce sloth among men. I fear me that the noble earl will soon be compelled to find other employment."

"What does my Lord Hic?" inquired Dimples, after a mournful pause.

"When the vagrancy act was passed," replied the ex-jester, "my Lord Hic could find nothing to which he could turn his hand; but his feet bore him bravely well in a dancing-school. Alas, on the very first night, being then far gone with sack, he introduced a number of new figures in a quadril, and the police took him away."

"In my father s time," said the prince, with flashing eyes, "these things could not hav happened, but now there is no ruler in the island."

"There you are mistaken," answered Flip; "the island is full of rulers. Everybody is now at once king and subject; he is supposed to help govern the others, while they govern him. Verily, in my mad days, no such jest as this ever came into my brain. But look you, Dimples, this kingship whereof we share with many thousand others will avail us naught; contrariwise, I fear me mightily for the many rulers which are over us. I hav bent my neck to the yoke, but you, who are a prince by blood——"

"I shall not yield," said Dimples; "I will go into exile across the deep channel to the island of Cuckoo."

"Where no one livs?"

"It does not matter. I will go all alone, if I can find no one of my father's subjects who is fool enough to follow me."

"If you say fool," observed Flip, "you seem to call on me, albeit I had thought to leave a profession which has so suddenly been overrun by amateurs. I will follow your highness where you will. It is surely better to laugh with the living than to mourn over the dead. These dark vestments accord ill with my disposition, although, should your highness starve to death on the island of Cuckoo, I shall hav at least learned how to bestow upon you a fitting interment."

It happened that at the very time when the prince and the fool were making their escape to the island of Cuckoo, the Lawmakers were discussing a project in which the land across the channel played an important part. There were certain severe features of the vagrancy act which had excited a great deal of outspoken opposition. It had become evident to Bluenose and his disciples that, in the effort to reform the people, they were getting near the limit of what would be tolerated. It was very doubtful whether a law to prohibit the drinking of liquor, a measure which was regarded as absolutely necessary before the Differentiation of Morals could proceed much farther, could be made to carry. It was then that Bluenose unfolded a contingent element in his scheme which he had hitherto kept back.

"Everybody, good and bad," said he, in a meeting of the ring, "hates to pay taxes, and any proposition looking to a reduction of expenses will carry easily. Our jails are now all filled to overflowing, and the public architect is at work on a number of new buildings in which to keep the prisoners caught up on these later laws which we hav passed. The cost of maintaining these malefactors is great, and cannot be much lessened by the work which they do. Across the channel lies the fertil island of Cuckoo. Let us offer the people a law that every transgressor of the statutes shall be carried thither, and not be allowed to return until he shall hav served out his term and made ample promises of amendment."

"They will promis anything to get back," said Grimmugg, "which will go for naught."

"Then let those who fail to reform be kept there for life. We shall thus be rid of them forever."

"But will they not fight among themselvs, or mayhap all starve to death?" suggested one of those present.

"Let them govern themselvs as best they may, and work hard if they would not perish. They are useless to us, and why should they liv on the products of our industry?"

"This plan," said Rhamrod, who, in behalf of his commander, Bluenose, had made a special study of the best methods for obtaining votes—"this plan has the great advantage that it removes from the field of operations those who are inclined to stand in the way of reform. These people make up the ragged edge of the social fabric; so fast as it forms let us trim it off and cast it away. Thus, in the end, we shall hav no evil doing in the island of Anser."

When the prince and the jester arrived on the island of Cuckoo they found the place uninhabited, save by the birds which called them a welcome from the trees and the goats which ran about among the rocky cliffs. Nevertheless Flip went along the shore proclaiming that Dimples, the son of King Cole, would henceforth rule over the island, and that all who emigrated hither from across the channel must be loyal subjects to him. The prince laughed at this, which he regarded as an idle jest; but a few days later, when a boatload of transported prisoners arrived, he found himself called upon to be a ruler in good earnest. Dimples was a modest and good-natured young man, but when it came to a question of rule or be ruled, the royal blood in his veins asserted itself.

No difficulty was experienced by the Lawmakers in getting the people to adopt their plan for disposing of the statute-breakers, and, after it was put into operation, several advantageous features developed which had not been foreseen. One was that the transported malefactors showed no desire to return. When the galley, bringing a fresh contingent of convicts, drew up on the beach at Cuckoo island, those who had been landed some time before, instead of begging to be taken back, hurled gibes at the officers and congratulated the newcomers on their escape. This was reported to the Lawmakers, who shook their heads at such an evidence of depravity, and thanked fortune that they were so well rid of an evil element.

Another great advantage in the system, as Rhamrod had explained, was that it made the voters very tractable. Each law offered was framed so as to affect only a small part of the people of the island, and it therefore easily obtained a majority, those who committed any infraction were transported, and were thus put out of the way of opposing the next measure.

"By this method," explained Bluenose, when complaint was made that the population of the island was rapidly falling off, "it is true that we pare the community down in some degree, but we shall ultimately come to a core which will contain only that which is valuable and without fault."

The process was a slow one, but Bluenose and his colleagues were not the men to deviate a hair from the purpose which they had set before them. There should be universal good behavior in the island of Anser, even though at the end nobody should be left to enjoy it save the Lawmakers themselvs. Bluenose, indeed, had his doubts about some of them.

The good work received material assistance from the votes of the women, who had succeeded in attaining the ballot, chiefly through the vigorous efforts of one Mistress Caddy. The law to prohibit the use of wine and ale, which had been for a long time held in abeyance, passed easily when this energetic lady led the fight in its behalf. Very few young men were left on the island, and those appeared to be of a sort not popular, for some reason, with the young women. Mistress Caddy helped through several laws which prescribed just what sort of garments should be worn by her own sex, and presently the transport-boats to the island of Cuckoo were carrying more women than men.

The people who still remained on the island of Anser, only a moiety of the original subjects of King Cole, now settled down to enjoy life in what they supposed a perfectly moral state. It was, perhaps, a fortunate thing that infractions of the law had ceased, for the reason that nearly all the officers and judges, who, at the beginning of the rule of the people, had been so vigilant and efficient, had managed to run foul of their own snares, and were now in the island of Cuckoo.

However, the Moloch of virtue was not quite yet appeased, and his high-priest, Bluenose, demanded a few more sacrifices. It was ascertained by the physicians that the practice of smoking tobacco in pipes was injurious to health, and an insidious lure to other evil habits. It was forthwith prohibited, and several members of the College of Lawmakers, who were too slow about complying, were sent across the channel. Tea, it was discovered, upset the nerves, and coffee demoralized the digestion. The use of these articles was abolished after a hard fight, in the course of which Mistress Caddy expressed her opinion publicly that Bluenose was as mean as he could be. Shortly after the law passed, this ill-affected lady was discovered by a spy drinking cold tea from a cologne bottle, and received the usual sentence of exile.

And now it began to be very lonesome on the island of Anser. Existence grew painfully dull for the few who remained there. Nothing ever happened which was funny or exciting, so they never laughed and were never moved. The laws compelled them all to be industrious, and there was plenty of work to be done. Presently, it was noticed that in spite of the fact that the statutes were never broken, the population continued to shrink. Exemplary citizens who stood high with the Lawmakers would suddenly disappear leaving no trace of their whereabouts.

At last there was a veritable stampede, and Bluenose and his immediate disciples awoke one morning to find themselvs quite alone in the former domain of King Cole. They met together in the room in the palace where the College of Lawmakers had been wont to assemble and execute its system of Differentiation. Now most of the seats were empty, and remaining members stared rather blankly at one another.

"What does it mean?" said Grimmugg. "Is it possible that our people hav voluntarily gone into exile?"

"Just as we had got them reduced to a proper moral condition!" exclaimed another of the council.

"They must hav secretly cherished evil and rebellious thoughts," said Bluenose, "and now they hav crossed the channel to liv with others of their own sort."

"What shall we do? We cannot certainly liv here all alone," cried another.

"I hav it!" said Rhamrod. "Why not ourselvs go over to the island of Cuckoo, and seek anew to lead these ill-disposed people into righteous ways? True, they deserve not our assistance, yet nevertheless——"

The words of Rhamrod were suddenly drowned by the blast of a bugle sounded without the portals of the assembly room. Bluenose and the others started to their feet. Then the doors swung slowly open, and Flip, the jester of their former monarch, entered, followed by a herald and a retinue of soldiers. The earl of Jaggs, in a condition of "beastly sobriety," as Flip was wont to call it, brought up the rear.

The procession marched to the middle of the room, the bugle sounded again, and then the earl of Jaggs said: "Give ear, Lawmakers of the island of Anser, to the proclamation of the king of the island of Cuckoo."

The Lawmakers stared at one another in silence, while the herald slowly unrolled a long piece of parchment and read in a loud tone of voice as follows:

WHEREAS, It hath been reported unto us by divers exiles, fugitivs, and emigrants from the island of Anser that no one now remains on this land save only the Lawmakers, they being the men who could not endure it that evil should exist in their sight; and, whereas, it hath been morcover told unto us that the aforesaid virtuous men do now plan how they may cross over to the island of Cuckoo, and there begin anew their making of many laws to the ultimate result that they would drive the people out of that land also. Therefore, it is proclaimed and shall be made known unto the Lawmakers themselvs that they are each and all forever exiled from the island of Cuckoo into the island of Anser, there to liv alone and to repent them of their virtue, and that should anyone of them violate this order and appear in our domain, he will be promptly filled with strong liquor and then given over to the merrymaking of the people.

Unto this order I set my hand and seal.

SON OF COLE, DIMPLES, KING.

When the herald was done reading, the company faced about and returned to the door. As they passed out, Flip waved his hand to the silent and astonished Lawmakers, and said: "We hav not so many laws as you, seigneurs, but we hav people to break them."

Under the young King Dimples all went merry in the island of Cuckoo. The mad times of King Cole were remembered in song and story, but they were not renewed, for all saw that there was much work to be done in the land to which they had come. A few who became discontented, some with the severity and others with the laxity of the rule of Dimples, fled across the channel to the island of Anser. They were not long in returning, and they brought with them the news that Bluenose and his companions were not living together in the capital city, but that they had exiled first one and then another to different corners of the island, and that now each lived a hermit's life, utterly alone, but supremely contented with his own virtue. In this manner was their plan for the Differentiation of Morals carried to a perfect completion.—Fred Bayham in the Argonaut.

Eminent Women.

Nearly all histories, newspapers, school-books, and even almanacs, giv precedence to man as master of the world. They speak of man as mentally and physically the superior of woman. Of man as the race, and woman as an appendix of man. But little by little woman is coming to the front. Little by little she is winning the recognition that is her just due. Little by little she is becoming the acknowledged equal of man, and who shall not say that in time she will take her rightful place as the wisest, best, most perfect, and most complete of all life's children, as "the justified mother of men?"

To aid somewhat in hastening on this desirable certainty—for all that is eventually best for humanity is desirable—I propose to make a few brief mentions of the most noted women of the past and the present, so that we may keep ever in mind the good, wise, and great things these women hav done and are doing for the race.

It needs line upon line and precept upon precept to impress a community with the truth, justice, and beneficence of any great and radical change from the old and time-honored customs and beliefs of the past.

The natural reverence we all hav for the accumulated wisdom and experience of our parents and guardians, and for all that is old and time-honored, makes it needful for us to put forth a mountain of energy, patience, and perseverance in pushing forward new and important reforms and truths—new to the masses, though they they may be old and accepted by many of the philosophers and thinkers. In these mentions I shall not aim to giv new items, but strive merely to put gleanings and facts in simple, short narratives, such as the general reader needs, whereby he may know the true worth of true women, and learn to look upon them as the pioneers of their own freedom as well as of the freedom of men.

"The hand that rocks the cradle moves the world." Woman molds and makes man. Dominated, enslaved, and crippled on every hand, she is still working for victory, and will win it just as sure as fate.

Through untried roads, with ambushed opponents lined,
Through many a sharp defeat, and many a crisis, often baffled,
Here marching, ever marching on, a war fight out—aye here,
To fiercer, weightier battles giv expression.

Not to battles with sword or gun, bloodshed and carnage, but battles of mind clashing against mind, and right dashing against wrong,

To where the future, greater than all the past,
Is swiftly, surely preparing.

The North American Turner Bund Fest.

Believing it not merely a matter of formal courtesy for favors received, but also necessary and wise, for English-speaking Secularists to cultivate on all possible occasions a closer alliance with our German brethren, who early in the history of this republic battled so boldly and nobly for mental liberty and the practical adoption of the Nine Demands, I took the pleasure of accompanying the Vorwarts and Aurora societies of this city to their national celebration at Cincinnati. This National Turner Bund fest occurs only every four years, and I eagerly took this occasion to further cement the fraternal feeling with our German friends, which it has been my aim to realize since my induction to the secretaryship.

On the train I met our friend Herman C. Boppe, editor of the Freidenker, Milwaukee, to whom I extended my congratulations on account of his recent entrance into the Benedictine order. Brother Boppe is a broad, philosophical writer and speaker, and a man of marked culture. While infused with the iconoclastic spirit, he also takes deep interest in the physical, moral, and social well-being of society, in which he continues to do noble work.

Carl Plum, of the Aurora society and one of our Secular Union members, was the general manager of the Chicago district, and it has taken him months of labor to perfect the details of such an excursion. His pretty daughters, also members of our society, added much to the enjoyment of our journey, the incidents of which were those customary to a jolly band of fifteen car-loads of jovial Germans.

One sad incident will ever remain a painful memory. One of the first to welcome me on the platform, with, "Well, Stevens, I'm glad you are going; we'll hav a jolly good time," was William Petzold, vice-president of the Vorwarts, and well known to many of the Secular Union, he having been a member of the class who furnished a gymnastic performance for a recent entertainment. At Indianapolis he crossed the track to get a cup of coffee, and stumbled over a rail, falling on his chest. No one supposed he was seriously injured, but he grew rapidly worse and died Sunday night. It was found that his liver had been split fully four inches. It was strange that so young an athlete should hav been injured by so apparently slight a cause. He was well beloved by all who knew him, and was only twenty-two years of age.

Arriving at the "Queen City" I paid my respects to Dr. McLeod, formerly of the Iowa University, an erudite scholar and genuin Liberal, whose departure from Chicago left an intellectual gap in our ranks not readily filled. He kindly showed me some of the architectural sights of the "Paris of America," particularly pointing out the magnificent fountain, situated on a broad plaza, where falling waters afford refreshing moisture to the sultry atmosphere, the melody being soothing to the tired stranger and softening the continuous whir of the cable cars. The water is that of the Ohio, and looks like a solution of yellow ochre; no wonder that water is tabooed, except for culinary purposes, in Cincinnati. This fountain, the finest I hav seen in America, besides the valuable grounds, was presented by a public-spirited citizen of Cincinnati. Next we saw the monster music hall, the Garfield monument, the government building and city hall—all excellent for their purposes, and surpassing those of Chicago. But Cincinnati has so many foul blots on its architectural harmony and beauty that they stand out in all the stronger relief because of their grotesque ugliness, which it will take time to wipe away. You will observe a massiv, stately building on one corner and a rickety den of squalor on the other—architectural meanness and magnificence in strange incongruity; and the same may be said of its streets. A block of misery and a block of prosperity are strangely intermingled. Perhaps the fire in Chicago was, after all, a blessing in disguise.

Following the doctor's advice I visited the zoological gardens, where are found rare and ferocious beasts, and birds of most beautiful plumage. A lady and gentleman chimpanzee are honored by special quarters, and are named Mr. and Mrs. Pat Rooney, on account of their strongly marked Milesian countenances. I not only "saw the elephant," but rode him. It is not the kind of rapid transit I prefer. It is a cross between the motion of an earthquake and a storm at sea.

The "fest" was inaugurated by a public reception at the great Music Hall Saturday evening, which was ablaze inside and out with brilliance. Lime lights threw a glare over the towers and façade, and the many-colored banners borne by the societies hightened the scene. Rockets rent the darkness of night from club house, street corner, and saloon, and the pyrotechnical display made the small boy suspect something was wrong with the calendar.

The center of the great hall had been denuded of chairs, and the Turners marched in with band playing and colors in front of the platform where a chorus of some three hundred voices sang an ode of welcome.

Henry Huen, editor of the official organ, Der Turn Zeitung, of Milwaukee, in a speech full of eloquence and enthusiasm, gave the colors to the Cincinnati district, to be retained by them for four years. I will condense in English Mr. Huen's remarks, for their historical interest. He said:

Thirty-nine years ago we met in Philadelphia to found the North American Turner Bund. Then we were few in number. We had come from Europe, where we had been battling for freedom, bringing to this country those ideas of liberty which had been the cardinal principles of the society since it was organized in 1830 by Father John. Then there were but seven Turn societies, with a membership of possibly one thousand. Now we number thirty-two thousand, with organizations reaching from the sands of the Atlantic to the Golden Gate of the Pacific, and from the pineclad islands of the northern lakes to the warm waters of the Gulf of Mexico. The principles of liberty and right against the encroschments of class will always be the purpose of the Turners. . . .

I herewith transfer to your keeping the flag under which, one hundred years ago, the fathers of this republic fought for the rights of mankind. Under this standard our comrades fought that four million slaves might be free. Their fight was successful. May our fight for the principles of our order be as successful in the future as they hav in the past.

President Tafel replied at length on the principles of the organization in reference to mental liberty, intellectual and physical culture, taking as his text the Latin motto of the Bund, Mens sana in corpore sano—a sound mind in a sound body.

Mayor Mosby bade them a significant welcome, for be it known that the Owens Sunday-closing law has been strictly enforced in Cincinnati of late. The mayor said he not only welcomed the Turners, but he extended the freedom of the city and turned over the keys to their keeping, satisfied they would be in safe hands.

After another song by the chorus, accompanied by the band and the Turners, the line of march was taken to the campus, where tents, food, and every detail had been attended to for the comfort of the "activs." Along this line of march the citizens displayed their enthusiasm by pyrotechnical outbursts.

Never before were there more than six hundred activ Turners competing for prizes; now there were not less than sixteen hundred, accompanied by thousands from their societies that were not "activs." From 5 A.M. to 6 P.M. Sunday the campus was alive with a most magnificent spectacle of trained men from all parts of the Union going through a variety of exercises requiring strength, skill, and precision. Fifty judges, all Turner teachers, were selected to note down the points or even fractions of points for or against the society or individual.

The contests were in the iron bar exercise, horizontal bars, parallel bars, vaulting, club-swinging, jumping, fencing, swimming, running, marching, and various other special exercises.

Every Verein was marshaled in military order fifteen minutes before its turn to compete, and after the exercise was marched back, so that absolute punctuality was observed and no time lost. Flags fluttered everywhere from staff and tent poles, and were it not for the presence of the stars and stripes, one could imagin himself at a great fête in a suburb of Berlin or Stuttgart or Dresden, for the German language is that of the commands and spoken everywhere, German letters and inscriptions are on every placard, while the music was mostly German, and the commissary department decidedly so.

The "activs" are nearly all young men of splendid physical development, fit to fight the battle of life or endure for their country. To convey an idea how this was done: We are supposed to be on the grand stand, fronting the great pedestal, surmounted by the great bronze bust of Father John. As the clock in the center points 4:15, the St. Paul Turners, the Central of Chicago, and the Williamsburgh of New York marched into the space assigned for the first group. The judges sat critically at their tables while the St. Paul boys exercised with the iron wand, the Chicagos on the parallel bars, and the Williamsburghers in some other special exercises—vaulting, jumping, military maneuvers, etc. Three other groups of three classes each were going through similar exercises at the same time, to the delight of thousands of visitors, largely ladies, who filled the grand stand. The Turners had no posing, no parade, no fuss, no posturing for the applause of the galleries, but work, hard work, and they went at it with the gravity of Heidelberg students at a Greek lecture.

Before the sun dropped behind the western hills, the bugle called and sixteen hundred Turners marched into the space from which all apparatus had been cleared. This was the mass eunbungen, or mass work, the feature of the day. The men march out, take up their position, then no command is given, but to the melody of the chorus and the music of the band sixteen hundred flannel-shirted, gray-uniformed men perform wonders of accuracy in the perfection of their wand drill. A regular army regiment could not do the same work in six months' practice. It is the German Delsarte system, bringing out not only "the poetry of motion," but perfecting the muscles. The movements are all graceful and elastic, bringing into symmetrical view every curved line—"the line of beauty." There was no "circus business," nothing but what adds to strength, beauty, and manly dignity. It was an inspiring sight, and the exhibition of the unity and harmony of motion without a commander, by men who never before came together, was indeed an apotheosis of manhood.

Athletics is a great lubricator, both mental and physical, and those who think the Turners mere gymnasts should hav attended the geistliche, or mental contest, at the Central Turner Hall Sunday night. Declamations, orations, speeches, and singing contests were in order. The extempore speakers were not allowed to know what subject they would draw, but in spite of that Carl Oetterli, of Peoria, Ill., gave an improvised poem on his subject. This is as good as the celebrated improvisitari can do. It was expected that the Aurora Turner Society of Chicago would be awarded first prize for their chorus, and they were somewhat disappointed at the second place, but the Vorwarts and the Aurora societies carried off more than their quota of honors, and made splendid records both individually and collectivly. Sunday evening your correspondent was down for a speech at the Grosser Commers des Chicago Turnbezirks abgehalten im Klosterbräu. If our Prohibition friends understand this, all right; if not, well and good.

Monday the heavy part of the contest was carried on by picked men from among the "activs," and their performances were something marvelous, closing with the wand drill again, amid the glare of calcium lights and lurid red fire, to the intense delight of some twelve thousand spectators. Thus closed the most important Turner Fest ever held on this continent, and one which cannot fail in its influence, not only on our German fellow-Freethinkers, but in furthering physical development in our public schools.

The great parade of Tuesday, in which it was estimated some twenty thousand participated in the procession, was one of the most imposing sights ever witnessed in this or any other country, and the marching most excellent.

Beside the Turners were the police mounted and on foot, the fire department, veteran German regiments and Grand Army posts, singing societies, and others, attesting by their participation the pride Cincinnatians felt over the fest.

This was somewhat different from the treatment Father John received in his time. His societies were broken up and he was imprisoned several times. But progress has conquered prejudice, and the unparalleled success of this meeting—beyond the anticipations of the most sanguin—will hav great weight in the future.

Why could not Secularists adopt something of the same training for their young people? We might popularize Secularism by the athletic features. I am glad to know that several members of the Chicago Secular Union are receiving this valuable instruction as activ Turners.

Bro. Geo. L. Robertson, one of the most jovial and companionable members of our Union, also came down to look after the writer. We paid a visit to Prof. Edgar C. Beall, formerly one of our board of directors, whom I had hoped to interest in the forming of a Union, but he contemplates leaving for Washington. I also had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Warren, who keeps a bookstore and sells THE TRUTH SEEKER.

To Dr. Straut and Carl Moehle, of the Vorwarts; to Adolph Rhein, speaker of the Aurora; to my friend Cobelli, of the same society, I extend my thanks for many courtesies, and best wishes that the Turner Bund shall exercise a greater influence in society throughout the whole country.

Some Miracles.

From Troy Hill, Pa., via the Indianapolis News, comes this yarn:

Troy Hill is to-day the Mecca to which thousands of the faithful journey. This is the 13th of June, the day of St. Anthony of Padua, the patron saint of Father Mollinger's church, in which are some of the bones of the saint, and it is on this day that Father Mollinger begins some of his almost miraculous cures. From every direction came the multitude of believers, among them being many Protestants. The lame, the halt, and the blind were there; puny, sickly childhood, halt and deformed youth, and diseased and afflicted age. Just beneath the pulpit there is carved a small image of St. Anthony. It is said that if an invalid kneeling before this image will rub his hand upon its forehead and then rub the same hand upon the afflicted portion of his body, at the same time praying devoutly for St. Anthony's aid in effecting a cure, he will subsequently be completely healed. Some wonderful cures were said to be effected in this way to-day. Annie Ames, a Protestant young lady of rare personal attractions, residing in the country near Youngstown, O., had been totally deaf for many years past. She prayed before the image of St. Anthony and rubbed its forehead for the first time yesterday. On rising from her knees she found to her great joy that she could hear the voices of the priests, and to-day, after offering her second petition to the great saint, she found that her hearing had become perfectly normal.

Miss Millie Corbin, a beautiful girl of this city, who was stricken with paralysis some two years ago, and whose lower limbs hav since been completely powerless, was borne up through the crowds to the image, and after rubbing its forehead and praying in the manner described for a few minutes, rushed out of the church, wholly unaided, and, like one of old, went about shouting and leaping and praising God.

A woman who has been boarding with Mrs. Buck on Troy Hill for some time has been unable to speak a word for two years. Father Mollinger gave her some medicin, talked to her for a time, and she finally called him by name.

A girl who had been compelled to use crutches went in. Father Mollinger, after prescribing for and working with her, said to her, "Put down your crutches and come with me." She hesitated a moment, laid down her crutches, and with feeble steps made her way toward him. He said she would be entirely well in a short time.

A Mrs. Winston, who was last year cured of cancer, and with her a mother with her little boy, were present to receive his blessing. Last year he had cured the boy of a hip disease which had afflicted him for years.

Carlyle said that the population of England comprised some thirty millions of people—mostly fools. The correspondent who sent that story to his paper must hav thought that the people of England had moved over here.

The Editor Loafed and Invited His Soul.

George Macdonald in San Francisco Freethought.

Some men are born tired, and never work,
Some men occasionally take a day off at their own expense,
Some hav had a holiday involuntarily thrust upon them.
The latter is my case exactly, I sing of the latter.

It is morning, sanctumed I sit at my desk, I open letters.
I see stamps for a sample copy, and occasionally a dollar bill,
But not often, or a postal note.
The door opens, I grasp my Editor's Companion, a sash weight of twelve pounds avoirdupoise,
But it is not a book agent, a tract distributor,
Or the man who remembers when the water came up to Montgomery street.
I let the sash weight hang by its string, pendulous, vibrant.

My visitor is the captain, he has plowed the sea, the large imperious waves;
He offers me a ride in a buggy along the water front, to the Union Iron Works, the Potrero.
I accept the offer, I enter the buggy, the tires of which are loose, the shafts rattle at the axle.
The horse is foundered in the forelegs, spavined in the rear, fifteen years old and upward.

We go along the water front, the ships above us projecting their bowsprits landward.
It is wash day on board, the sailors' red flannel shirts hang in the fore rigging,
The street is lined with gin mills to the westward, the doors open,
To the east stretches the bay over toward Oakland—
Rum upon one side of us, and water upon the other,
Shall we turn to the right and get drunk as a fiddler,
Or to the left and be drowned in the water?

We go ahead straight as circumstances will permit,
We reach at length the Union Iron Works, the Potrero.
In the offing lies the Charleston; with a smokestack large as the trees in Santa Cruz county.
(She is a cruiser, while the trees are Santa Cruzers, as I remark to myself, suppressing a shriek of laughter.)
Here is a steam dredger, diving, dredging for mud,
Not for the sake of the mud, but for the hole left when the mud is gone.
Charleston, I salute you! you are for a plaything—
The big boys who run our government will hav fun with you.
For the people who pay for you it is not so funny.
Here in the dry dock is the Victoria, having the mud scraped from her bottom.
Ah, there, Victoria, I greet you. Wait for me, I will not hurt you.
Here is the Rev. St. So-and-so, laid up for a new gilguy,
(Rev. St. is the abbreviation shortwise, comprehensiv, used by the papers for revenue steamer.)
Over yonder is the San Francisco—steel scantling and clapboards of red iron,
She will make another plaything for the boys who run our government.

Here is the City of Puebla, we hitch our horse and go aboard of her.
The men are scraping the machinery, cleaning her engins for the next trip,
Other men are covering her boilers and steam pipes
With Magnesia Sectional Covering, made of asbestos and magnesia,
It conserves the heat, renders the interior of the ship comfortable,
Establishes a temperate climate in the midst of equatorial latitudes.
It is light, dry, artistic, and totally impervious to fire.
When I die I shall order a suit made of magnesia sectional covering.
It will rob death of its sting and the grave of its victory.
I look at the ship all I want to. I discover that she is hollow.
Then the captain takes me back to the office,
Before going up-stairs he treats me to a glass of lager bier.

I am not writing this poem for a dollar and a half, nor to fill up space,
I hav just been reading Walt Whitman, and this is the result.
This is the result of a ride to the Potrero, and a perusal of "Leaves of Grass."
Some day I shall hav a monument on account of this poem.
Some day the litterateurs will hold a dinner in Camden, New Jersey, in honor of my birth.
So I am not writing for the present, but for the future, not for a dollar, but for glory.

Some people hav no poetry in them, but I am full of it.
I do not believe the ocean is chiefly beautiful on account of the clams you can dig on the seashore.
I look upon the statue of liberty as an emblem.
It symbols freedom lighting the world by the electric system,
It is not intended, as some suppose, to represent a young woman, just retiring, in the act of turning off the gas.
I started out for a holiday in San Francisco, and bring up, metaphorically, in New York harbor,
Many others hav gone that way, literally, crossing the isthmus, working their passage.

Mr. Bradlaugh's Modest Fish Story.

From the National Reformer.

Loch Long was reached—by continuous travel through the night from the Hall of Science conference—at half-past twelve on Monday. . . . I hav thoroughly enjoyed myself from Monday afternoon until Saturday morning, with fairly good weather and very good sport. Fish to the number of 268, weighing 326lbs., fallen to one rod and line in four and one-half days, is enough to drive away all irritation. If it were not for the midges, life on the Clyde loch would last week hav been nearly perfect except on Thursday afternoon, when for three hours or so a cold wintry gale came on in half gusts and temporarily spoiled the fishing. I had no very large fish—one 5lb., a few 4lbs., several 3 lbs., about a dozen 2lbs., and a goodly assortment of 1½ lb. to 1lb., the rest between ½lb. and ¾lb. My best day was on Friday, 80 fish weighing 88lbs. I regretted to leave so early on Saturday, but no other boat would serve for the London express from Greenock, and here I am back at work very brown, a little midge-bitten, and very hopeful.

Mrs. Krekel's Idea of Secularism.

From the Akron, O., Sunday Telegram.

Mrs. M. P. Krekel, of Kansas City, Mo., was sitting in William Buchtel's private office at the Akron Savings Bank, last evening, in company with a small party of friends, when a Telegram reporter entered and solicited an interview. Mrs. Krekel is a Liberalist lecturer of wide renown among her Freethinking friends, and is one of the vice-presidents of the American Secular Union, of which Col. Robert G. Ingersoll was formerly president. Mrs. Krekel is a pleasant-appearing lady, of about middle age, and apparently well educated and well informed on the questions she discusses.

"My husband," said Mrs. Krekel, "was one of the last appointments to the federal bench by President Lincoln previous to his assassination. I am a member of Prof. Felix Adler's Ethical Society, and am more pronounced than some of the members, going so far as Colonel Ingersoll and other Liberalists and asking that church property be taxed as well as other property."

"Any general points you can giv me in regard to your work would probably be interesting," suggested the reporter.

"Well, the work is from a basis of natural morality superseding the ecclesiastical theory of restraint. The main stress of the work is to secure the entire secularization of the government, keeping ecclesiastical matters out of legislation. The endeavor is to try to realize in this government what the founders evidently intended it should be—purely secular. No predominance of one religion over another, but equal rights to Christians, Mormons, Buddhists, and others. We aim at the secularization of the schools, and are opposed to the puritanical ideas of observing what is called the Sabbath, which is really the old Sabbath set apart by the pagans. The Protestants want their Bible in the public schools, and the Catholics hav as good a right to want theirs. What we want is no Bible at all in the schools. Let them teach from Bibles in their Sunday-schools and leave the public schools free and untrammeled."

MESSRS. LENNSTRAND and Lindkvist hav begun at Stockholm, Sweden, the publication of a monthly journal called the Freethinker. There is no disposition on their part to surrender to the church.

MRS. R. B. HAYES, wife of Ex-President Hayes, is dead, stricken with paralysis and living but a few days after the stroke. The religious papers are extolling her to the skies. The Advocate says: "Those who only heard of her religious ways and the exclusion of intoxicating liquors from the White House may hav thought her bigoted, but those who met her there missed not the wine, such was the unaffected grace of her bearing and the charm of her heartiness." Say nothing but good of the dead, is sound charity, but we can not forget that it was Mrs. Hayes's "religious ways" that kept D. M. Bennett in a prison cell for nearly thirteen long months, and brought the keenest anguish to another woman whose unaffected grace of bearing more than equals any charm Mrs. Hayes may hav had, and who in her silent sorrow proved herself a thousand times worthier the name of woman than Mrs. Hayes in her regal power, as wife of a president.

MR. H. O. PENTECOST says in his last Twentieth Century: "E. M. Macdonald, the able and genial editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, has won my heart by the admirable manner in which he treated the subject under discussion between us last week. How good a thing is gentleness and kindness of heart, and how pleasant it is to feel that we and our useful and earnest neighbor uptown are on very good terms. May it always be so." We remarked at the time mentioned that Mr. Pentecost is a good man to hold a disputation with, and as the point of difference between us seems to be satisfactorily settled by Mr. Pentecost's admitting that the Liberals are all right, there is no reason in the world why THE TRUTH SEEKER and its Warren street (next door to Mr. Stewart's art gallery) contemporary should not dwell together in peace. Mr. Pentecost has a few reforms on hand that we cannot help him with, but in the main battle for liberty of thought and justice for all we can stand shoulder to shoulder. And we don't want any better ally than the earnest, sacrificing, big-hearted ex-preacher.

Praise God, from whom all blessings flow.

Praise God, from whom all tortures come. Praise him, all hearts wrapped in agony; all whose cheeks are blistered by the scalding tears wrung from eyes that feel the torturing pain of God's cruel visitation. Praise him with throbbing brain and broken heart for his well-administered excruciating lashes, without which we are fatherless.

Homage thus paid to him, is taking leave of all decency, love, and pity. One may be guided, through fear, to utter words that thought, with reverence of what is just, knows to be false as hell and abominable as the stench which stifles life. Praise God, when all which the struggle of life has brought forth in its deep experience has been wantonly outraged by a well-directed relentless method of torture. Praise a God who is deaf to any noble sentiment which thrills a human heart. All the humane virtues of the race—pity, tenderness, sympathy—hav been insulted by a silence that had no words of encouragement and an inaction that would not lend a helping hand. Praise the relentless foe of the race, who "laughs at human calamity and mocks when fear cometh." Ye demons damned, if such there be, set up your claims for praise and worship. Do the worst you can, ye prince and potentate of hell—you are outdone a thousand times by him whom fear and superstition hav placed upon a throne in eternity. He, O satanic majesty, discounts all your basest deeds when he sends his floods and fires the snapping fagot. Resign your throne, impious devils; you are outdone in cruelties many, many times by him who, tradition tells, had love so great that he gave his only son to death to save a sinful race. If what we are often told is true, that our father in heaven is love, and "his tender mercies endure for ever;" that "we are safe beneath the shadow of his wing;" that he is compassionate and kind, and, weeping over us, asks, "Why will ye die?"—that he in the fullness of his love says unto us, "Ask and ye shall receive;" "call upon me in the day of trouble and I will answer thee"—if these statements are true; if they are to be taken as a truthful representation of the nature of God; if he, so loving us, from lack of power or any cause had had to look on that horrible calamity, then we affirm that the throne of the mighty God would be vacant, and this loving God would lie at its foot dead with grief. The sun and stars would hav long since gone out—nothing but the black and mournful cinders of a universe would remain, hissing in the eternal silence of the death of God and the universe. God would be dead of a broken heart.

If God is as reported to us, loving and tender, then the terrific misery, war, and tortures of the centuries are recorded as the murderers of God. Tenderness, pity, supreme love, and infinit goodness must die at such a sight. Oh, think of existence in a universe of ever-increasing woe and misery, anguish that defies description. Think of infinit pity and love surrounded by such continued unmitigated agony. No God could endure the sight and liv. No human eye could see the thousandth part of this world's suffering and not suffer a fatal blindness and death. God almighty's infinit heart would break at such a sight if that heart was one of love.

The only refuge is, that what we hav been told of God is not true. He cannot be known in the terms of love, pity, or kindness. These, as we find them developed in human life, in no way apply to God. These terms are in a language which he does not know. For it is evident beyond a reasonable doubt that, in that part of his administration in which intervention is possible, we see nothing which in the least tends to reveal that he knows anything about those sentiments. He sees the most frightful disasters, the deepest agony, but never makes himself known. Prayer comes from the lips and heart of helpless despair, when none but God can help, yet no help comes from him. So if he is at all, he is so far above us that he has no more care or thoughts about us than has the elephant when he puts his great feet on an ant-hill. Is there a human being in this wide world, is there a devil in hell—suppose that the devil and hell are just as the churches state they are—that would hav stood with the power to render help to the thousands that perished in the great flood, and not rendered that help? It is unbelievable. God alone could do this.

J. H. BURNHAM.

Mammon the Guide and Aim of Modern Religion.

Admitted that in the early times when the advent of Christianity had passed into a state of a religious nature, a century or so after the alleged coming and going of Christ, which outbreak against the previously existing religion of that locality had doubtless been the handiwork of crafty, ambitious men seeking renown, there must hav arisen a class of men of much lesser note yet of tender sensibilities, who were readily caught up as itinerant disciples and teachers by the emotional presentments of this new gospel. Observation of the general bias of the people of this sort, of whatever period of events, should clear them of mercenary taint. Their sense of right and duty may hav often been wrong, but their motivs must hav been pure.

We hav now to do with another class, and, in the main, of a modern age. Almost without exception the members of this class may be set down as posturing and preaching in the name and passion of Christ and the holy trinity for the evangelization of the human race, charged to be in peril of endless and merciless torment for sins alleged against each and all of the race; sins too, in large degree implanted by heredity—so acquired, not sins—yet strangely charged up by these evangelists to the parentage of the infinit and accounted merciful God whom they worship.

There remain for consideration some inquiries into the major designs and methods of the more censurable members of the religious classes; and in so dividing the classes we wish it to be understood that our censure shall fall less and less by gradation in favor of those who hav conscientiously eliminated the motivs of pecuniary gain, vanity, etc., from their designs in the discharge of their accepted religious occupations. We shall aim only to dissect the apparent motivs of these devotees of Mammon.

In order to best present this undertaking and to thereby economize space, we will make use of leading queries, leaving my readers to decide upon them.

First. Is not the whole adult human race characterized by an inclination to direct all social and sentimental affairs, if having the power to do so?

Second. Is not the attainment of power, individually, foremost in the thoughts of the race?

Third. Does not civilization ever tend to the largest possible accumulation of wealth, irrespectiv of the common welfare, and regardless of religious views and institutions?

Fourth. Is it saying too much to say that intelligence undermines itself by rejecting the dicta of its reasoning faculties in the pursuit of baseless faith? And may not such undermined intelligences be justly rated as not only enemies to truth, but as constructiv associates of the criminal classes at large, also?

It is indeed a sad spectacle to see the great masses of our business people seriously and selfishly engrossed in the accumulation of wealth, knowing that many are kept in poverty by their successes; but what shall be said of those who affect to build their spiritual temple in fields of endless glory, far removed from the temptations of Mammon and his hosts?

We will push the point. Taking the initiatory it will be observed that gospel students seek education in that line in colleges, overlooking the superior resources to be found on application at the very source of all religious knowledge, free. Why this choice? There can be but one explanation: These colleges, in the way of business, raise the lambs to supply the wants of the vacant churches, also in the way of business. A trade passes, and mammon, like hope, is granted tending to large entailments in the line of salaries. It is business!

Well, as to the churches: The popular reputation of these institutions is well enough known to be founded, severally, upon the gorgeousness of the structure, the extremity of the cost of its musical enticements, the attractiv vestments, and the goody-goody utterances of the well-paid preacher; and, never to be overlooked, the ultra displays of freshest fashion upon the patron millionaires attending. It is but an array of monumental business! The poor and the meek cut no figure in the spectacle.

Recurring again to Mammon, in conclusion, we wish to refer to the future of our popular liberties thought to be in danger. This state of the case has arisen by the associated purposes of Mammon and the church to reinstitute a universal hierarchy. Their former history is well known to hav been but a record of measureless tyranny, persecution, and the extremity of cruelty.

The united powers of these agencies as the social condition now is, might readily accomplish this fatal end. A struggle of suppressed liberty to rise again might bathe the earth with blood for centuries, to result in deeper prostrations, with the friendly lights of reason and science extinguished. The very thought is terror!

What hope of better days is there to console the faithful? Little, we fear. But one's line of action to this end is open to view. It is the legal enforcement of a divorce between Mammon and the church. The bountiful salaries, the splendor of official trappings, the much-coveted recognition of clerical power, etc., attendant upon priestly vocations, all gone, religion with all of its outer forms would suddenly fade away, and, universal liberty triumphant, the earth, for the first time, would be covered by intelligence and a happy populace.

D.

The Origin of Christianity.

I am glad to see "Antichrist" again turning his attention to the origin of Christianity. I believe there is yet something to be learned by investigation of that subject. More than one of the Gnostic churches which he admits were older than Christianity (and they must hav been in existence long before the first century) examined the Hebrew scriptures, and denounced the God of the Jews as an ambitious, malevolent, and rebellious third-class deity, who was hostil to the supreme God. For it should be remembered that in the original of our Bible, the first verse of the first chapter reads: "In the beginning the Gods created the heaven and the earth." This Professor Huxley admitted in an article printed some three years ago. Jehovah, instead of being the supreme God, had no jurisdiction beyond Palestine. He was and claimed to be the God of the Jews only, was hostil to the rest of the world, and promised the Jews final supremacy over it—a promis as yet unfulfilled.

This mistranslation of the first chapter should be kept before the people as one of the great crimes of Christianity, to which the late revisers are accessories, inasmuch as they failed to correct it. The controversy in the church of which Peter and Paul were members, and in which controversy, according to a passage in Galatians, they were opponents, resulted, in the third century, in the adoption of the Old Testament, and of Jehovah as the supreme God. And our gospels could not hav been written till after this event, in consequence of the necessity of inventing incidents to conform to the alleged predictions of the Hebrew prophets, for all through these gospels are passages like the following: "This is come to pass that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet."

"Antichrist" admits that there are a few passages in our epistles of Paul which "seem to support the hypotheeis that he was a Gnostic, believing in a phantom Jesus." Now, it is a fact that they not only seem to support it, but, taken in connection with what we know of his belief from Marcion, they are all the proof needed to establish the fact if Marcion's evidence were insufficient. And Marcion's evidence is a life devoted to the cause to which Paul gave his life, viz., the maintenance of the faith of the church to which he, Paul, was a convert. For Paul's Jesus was Marcion's Jesus, who, according to Marcion's gospel, "came down to Capernaum, a city of Galilee, and taught them on the Sabbath days." We are left to suppose that he went up when the service was over.

I admit that much of our information about Marcion is untrustworthy, and there is obscurity and uncertainty about almost everything in the early history of Christianity, but the author of "Supernatural Religion," while admitting the existence of Justin Martyr's and Marcion's gospels early in the second century, and looking for traces of ours, which he fails to find, incidentally mentions Marcion's devotion to Paul's beliefs, and their hostility to Judaism. He was not looking for anything of the kind, and must hav found abundant evidence of these facts to refer to them as he does. And certainly no one who has read his volumes will question his integrity. Nor does he seem aware of the importance of what I may call his discovery, which shows us why Paul's epistles were garbled, and why epistles were forged in his name. No epistle attributed to Paul can be genuin except those which Marcion had, for he would hav compassed heaven and earth to get everything that Paul wrote. "Antichrist" himself would not hav been more zealous in that direction.

"Antichrist" says, in conclusion, that the writer of the Pauline epistles was not a Gnostic. This I admit, because the writer of the Pauline epistles, as we hav them, garbled them. And if Tertullian's version of the epistles agrees, substantially, with ours, it should be remembered that Tertullian lived well into the third century, and Manes of the third century complains that Paul's epistles were garbled. Marcion, Paul's defender, was dead, and Tertullian, who was certainly given to scurrility, may hav been sufficiently unscrupulous to adapt the epistles to the changed faith of the church.

Christians even in our day will strain a point for the glory of God. From the first chapter of Acts we learn that Judas Iscariot was a bishop. Some forty days after the crucifixion, when Jesus took his final leave of his disciples, about one hundred and twenty of them met together to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Judas, "for it was needful that this should be done that the scripture might be fulfilled which the Holy Ghost spoke by the mouth of David, concerning Judas, who was to guide them that took Jesus. For it is written in the book of Psalms: Let his habitation be made desolate, and let no man dwell therein, and his bishopric let another take."

Now, the fact that Judas Iscariot was a bishop would satisfy any intelligent person that his church had been established for years; therefore, the revisers of our Bible, instead of acknowledging, as honest men would hav done, that the fact proved the Jesus story false, changed it so that it reads: "And his office let another take."

Such was the honesty of those venerable old gentlemen, chosen from the most eminent of the Christians of England and the United States to revise the Bible—a book so sacred in the estimation of multitudes that they were shocked at the simple proposal for its revision. S. PALMER.

A Jew on the Jew-Converters.

Encouraged by the overwhelming success which truth achieved over falsehood, I will add a few more truthful statements, for which you are seeking. Your intelligent readers are by no means ignorant of the various schemes sought after by Christianity to giv it the appearance of being essential to the happiness of the poor, miserable sinner. That of missionary work, on account of the untold fortunes behind it, predominates. Hence the tens of thousands of dollars sunk at St. Mark's place, where, we are told, Jewish converts to Christianity are churned out with the speed of electricity. That these false statements are manufactured for the sole purpose of extorting money from the unwary is no longer left to conjecture, but is supported by solid, living facts, many of which are by this time familiar to not a few of your numerous readers. In addition, allow me to present you with a few more facts.

The 11th of November, 1888, which happened to be on a Sunday, was a gala day for the vultures of St. Mark's place, for on that day at 3 P.M. the bell of Freshman, missionary to the Jews, was violently pulled by Mr. Lehrman, another missionary to the Jews, apprising the first missionary to the Jews that Adolph Green, who was about to receive the baptismal water, is already drenching wet with the baptismal water he had received before. Mr. Freshman, claiming to be the son of a Jewish rabbi, concluded that it was the jealousy of his rival brother missionary. Hence the contested Mr. Green was duly baptized the same evening in my presence at the "pretty little church."

On the 15th of the same month a glowing account appeared in the Christian Advocate where Dr. Buckley gave three hallelujah cheers for the work done at the pretty little church. After conferring the degree of ex-rabbi upon the sincere, innocent, newly converted Christian, Mr. Green, he wound up in a stirring appeal for funds, which the "pretty little church" was sorely in need of. In the mean time rumors of a very unpleasant nature reached the ears of Drs. Crosby and Deems, and the rest of the trustees of the "pretty little church," to the effect that notwithstanding the newly made Christian glorified in the name of Green, he was not so green in the conversion business. Hence a fiery correspondence between Dr. Crosby and the mongers of the rumors sprung up. Finally an indignation meeting was held at the library of Dr. Crosby's church in the presence of six clergymen headed by H. B. Turner, the president of the pretty little church. There four missionaries to the Jews, Messrs. Lehrman, Goldstein, Landsman, and Lucky, in the presence of the arch missionary to the Jews, Freshman himself, reiterated their statement to the effect that Mr. Green had permitted his red head to be bathed in holy water more than was good for him. As a matter of course, Mr. Freshman was whitewashed and the quartet of missionaries were left in the—soup.

Mr. Freshman, encouraged by his triumph over his sworn enemies, his brother missionaries to the Jews, conceived the idea—since his success in converting the New York Jews knows no bounds, as an unconverted Jew in this city is at a premium and could be seen only at a Bowery dime museum—of trying his luck in the holy land of Canaan, there to make a clean sweep of "all the Jews, both young and old, little children and women, in one day." This scheme of his would also answer the purpose of a flight to escape my wrath when I made it too hot for him in my letter which I addressed to him December 19, 1888, and which was published since.

Mr. Freshman—who does not believe in worldly enjoyments, as the vast fortune bestowed upon him he invests in faith, upon which he and his good wife are solacing themselvs—packed up a few chunks of that faith to keep soul and body together and sailed, first cabin, with his faithful wife on the Britannic. That he found Mr. Green a man after his own heart is natural enough. Hence, he installed the said Mr. Green to represent him spiritually in his absence, and also to look after his household goods, which, though neither Mr. Freshman nor his wife cared for them, are of the most expensiv nature possible. While Mr. and Mrs. Freshman enjoyed a few slices of the choicest faith in mid-ocean and prayed, no doubt, for his sincerity, our friend Mr. Green, who was anchored on dry land at the "pretty little church," argued thus: Since he had been already baptized three times and realized all that his godfather had promised him, he resorted to a little scheme of his own, i. e., to pack up the clothes of his fellow-convert, together with the expensiv bric-a-brac that adorned the mantel-piece of the faith-eater, Freshman. After making a convenient package to carry, he seemed to be in such a hurry for departure that he forgot to leave his future address behind him. The strangest of all is that our Green, triple convert to Christianity, did not touch a single tract or Hebrew Testament, as he considered them useless or valueless. What he did carry off were things that could be converted into the idol of the convert, the almighty dollar. The Christian ministers, especially those advocating the conversion of the Jew, seem to be so accustomed to such events as those practiced by convert Green that no notice was taken by them. No meetings were held in the church library of Dr. Crosby, neither were there any "editorial" remarks in Dr. Buckley's Advocate. This is pure and simple Christianity. This is the reason why the Jew is excluded from the Christian inns and clubs—simply that he refuses to belong to a gang of thieves baptized in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.

To those hypocrits, alias Christian bigots, who taunt me that I hav accomplished nothing by my writings, I will say, while it is true that I hav accomplished nothing in the shape of dollars and cents, upon which conversion hinges, I hav nevertheless accomplished such wonders in the shape of thoroughly exposing falsehood in all its phases, that I now dare Dr. Crosby to repeat that the conversion emporium at St. Mark's place is not a mongering establishment where Jewish souls are traded—unless he will modify it and christen it a den of thieves. I dare Dr. Ward, of the Independent, to challenge me to "prove it." I dare Dr. Ferris, of the Christian Intelligencer, to advocate the necessity of a hundred Freshmans. And I dare Dr. Buckley, of the Christian Advocate, to eulogize the converts made at the "pretty little church" whose ornaments hav been converted into cash by the muchly converted Adolph Green. Could I wish for a greater triumph? This I hav achieved not by might and not by strength, but by the spirit of truth, which is the sworn enemy of converted Jews to Christianity.

This same truth which is so eagerly sought after by you is christened by influential Christian ministers and editors, Infidelity. Being a truth seeker myself, allow me to state that attacking religion in general and the Bible in particular is love's labor lost. I claim there is enough good to be found in religion and the Bible. Therefore the duty devolved upon every true truth seeker is to point out to the world the abuse and perversion of religion by its hypocritical teachers, who, for the sake of sucking the lifeblood of the Christian pocketbook, resort to the device of the missionary scheme, where millions are sunk annually, circulating false reports how their success is overwhelming, blinding the eyes of their dupes with absurdities of faith with which he or she can, they say, remove mountains, cure the sick, and resurrect the dead. But when one has the temerity to ask to be shown the traveling mountains, the cured sick, and the resurrected dead, he is stamped as an Infidel.

What I object to is the consequences of Christian belief, as every Jew after being converted to such belief turns out to be a thief and scoundrel. Look at Ex-Rabbi Rosvalley, whose term in the penitentiary has not yet expired. Look at Ex-Rabbi Kramer, whose term has just begun. Look at Ex-Rabbi Green, who is a candidate for the penitentiary, provided he would send his address to Inspector Byrnes.

Besides, I fail to see anything the matter with the Jew. To quote Shakspere slightly changed, Has he no feeling? Does he not bleed when cut? Does he not squeal when kicked? As to his sympathetic feelings, look at the late Johnstown disaster. Did the Jew wait to respond to the appeal for help until urged by the missionaries? Nay, assistance was rendered by Jew, Christian, Infidel, even by the heathen Chinee, while not a copper was contributed by the gang of converted Jews. At present I am proud of belonging to more than one philanthropic and educational undertaking, while if I became a partner of Freshman my inclination for doing charity would be at an end. Show me Freshman's name attached to any Christian or Jewish charitable institution. What a charm the baptismal water must exert! It exonerates everybody from giving, and is a license for begging, and, to tell the truth, for stealing.

Ye Christian ministers and editors, I sternly protest against following the conversion business; not so much on account of theology, but I object to association with Glamowitz, Rosvalley, Kramer, Green, Freshman, Salzman, Rubin, and many more too numerous to mention.

As a friend of Christianity, I would advise the board of the "pretty little church:" As long as you cling to the ignoramus, hypocrit, beggar, Freshman, son of a rabbi (?), not only must you be satisfied with converts like Green and company, but you expose yourself to be tortured by the instrument of truth at the hands of every free thinking Jew. This torture is in retaliation for the torture your ancestors inflicted upon my ancestors for being true to their conviction, as I am to mine. The only difference is that my ancestors were unfortunate enough to liv during the period of the Inquisition, while I am fortunately living in a period which, thanks to Thomas Paine, Jefferson, and Benjamin Franklin, declares that we are all entitled to our free opinion. Hence my opinion is that the "pretty little church" under the mismanagement of Jacob Freshman, greatest ignoramus living, is not only a stain upon Christianity, but a den for thieves as well. This opinion is also shared by many honest Christian divines and editors, as I will prove later on. A. BENJAMIN.

Infidelity.

What is infidelity, and who may with propriety be called infidels? The words infidel and fidelity are from the same Latin root, fidelis. In the former the prefix in (not) is used, while in the latter it is omitted. The original, fidelis, means faithful, from fides, faith. The word faith does not primarily and necessarily refer to what one believes, but to his fidelity to whatever he believes. The more comprehensiv and practical meaning of the original word relates specially and primarily to the matter of faithfulness to a trust or contract, and hence, in the language of the law, adultery is denominated "infidelity," because it is a violation of the marriage contract. By palpable perversion of language, and doubtless out of deference to ecclesiastical bigotry and arrogance, lexicographers hav added to the original and real philological meaning of the word an arbitrary and utterly unjustifiable definition, founded entirely upon the puritanic usus loquendi, and applied it to the matter of a creed, what one believes regarding the dogma of a single sect, as to the infallible inspiration of its doubtful scriptures—doubtful as to their origin, doubtful as to what they really teach, and equally doubtful as to the real character and teachings of the alleged founder of the sect. Against this perversion I firmly protest and refuse to be called an infidel until I shall hav been proved unfaithful to a trust. According to the real meaning of the word, I would as soon be called a defaulter as an infidel. In my judgment independent investigators and Freethinkers hav not been wise in tacitly accepting an opprobrious name without an earnest denial and an indignant retort. No class of men on earth are more free from infidelity than those who are villified as infidels by those to whom the stigma properly belongs. In behalf of the Rationalists and Liberals of the world, I flatly deny that they are infidels, and boldly retort by charging the rankest infidelity upon the paid, professional Christian clergy, with few exceptions, in that they are unfaithful in the search for truth, often suppress it when they happen to find it, and as frequently suggest the false, and even unfaithfully and dishonestly preach what they do know to be false! Such men are the real infidels.

I close with a kindly hint to some of our Rationalistic writers and speakers who sometimes use the expression "orthodox infidelity," or similar words. Herein I think our "Homers" are caught "nodding!" Has it come to this that there are men in our Liberal ranks who are not only willing to be stigmatized as infidels, that is, as defaulters and unfaithful persons, but tacitly admit that they belong to a SECT having a "shibboleth" or standard of orthodoxy like other sects? Can it be true that some Freethinkers cannot tolerate free-thinking? Let Liberals beware lest they fall into the secret snares of the narrow bigots who "profess and call themselvs orthodox Christians!" Let Freethinkers hav no tests of "good and regular standing" except those of moral character, manly honor, and mental freedom.—R. B. Westbrook in Freethinkers' Magazine.

A Clergyman's Sonnet On June.

The world with blooming beauty now is bright,
Sweet hope and promis in all things I see;
Pathetic grows the cough assumed by me
To gain a furlough and the Isle of Wight;
I walk the odorous meads with pure delight,
Where the blithe lambkin gambols wild and free,
While I observe the dusty-belted bee
Into the waving lily sink from sight.
A rosy peace the day serenely fills;
The dimpled clouds lie still against the blue;
A benison lies on the land and sea.
O June, whose generous flowers robe the hills,
Of all the months my favorit are you,
Sweet month of mating-song and wedding fee!

The Casino at Monte Carlo.

From the Christian Advocate.

A Scotch Presbyterian minister, accompanied by his wife, went in. They stood looking, and at last he began to debate putting down his money. His wife tried to dissuade him. Finally he said he would put down a piece, but would not take away the result. He did and won, then left the money on the number and won again, putting in his possession by the law of increase, shown by the numbers, probably more than ever he had had at one time in his life. He took it up and went out with it. He staked more than he knew, for with the coin he threw his soul on the table.

An authentic story was told us of an American minister who was intrusted with the care of a young man of wealth. When they reached Monte Carlo the minister advised the young man not to go into the gambling-house, and, to induce him not to do so, said that he would not if the young man would not go. To this they agreed. Two hours afterward the young man's resolution failed him, and stepping in the first person he saw was the minister! To this day he justly denounces him as a hypocrit.

The Bruno Statue and the Catholic Church.

The erection of the monument in Rome to Giordano Bruno had a more depressing effect upon the pope than even the dispatches sent here at the time of its unveiling indicated. The celebration of the event was magnificent, and attended with immense enthusiasm. No such sight, says the London Freethinker, has been witnessed in Rome since Victor Emmanuel, the first king of united Italy, was carried to his tomb. The procession was headed by Garibaldians in their red shirts, which appeal to all that is noblest in Italian hearts. Then came the students of all universities, shouting vivas for Giordano Bruno and Liberty of Thought. Nearly two thousand banners were carried, and the deputations were too numerous to count. A special deputation was sent by the town of Nola, Bruno's birthplace, headed by the mayor. Arrived at the Campo de Fiori, the Field of Flowers, where the illustrious martyr perished, the procession halted. The white cover of Ferrari's noble work was removed amid the wildest enthusiasm, and Signor Bovio delivered a brief address, summing up Bruno's work and character and his position in the European movement toward liberty and progress. The vast crowd cheered the orator lustily. In the evening a banquet was held in the Palace of Fine Arts. Eminent men were the speakers, and the bust of Bruno upon the table was the object of an ovation.

For days before the dedication of the statue the clericals foamed with rage. They issued what the Freethinker calls a "screaming" circular, from which it makes this extract: "The scandal about to be perpetrated in Rome wounds and vexes every Christian soul. Bands of miscreants, bearing the black livery of Satan, are assembling in this sacred city—the center and heart of Christianity. With impious eagerness they applaud the erection of a monument which, in this city of Rome, will be a permanent insult to God, to Christ, and to his vicar on earth. The mind shudders at the horrible idea; but if the hearts of the faithful are pierced with grief, how much more profound and dolorous must be the grief of the common father of the faithful—the Sovereign Pontiff Leo XIII." The Austrians, who fully equal the Spaniards in their slavish subserviency to Rome, added their shrieks to the general uproar. The emperor wrote a sympathizing letter to the pope; the bishop of Linz ordered prayers to be said "in expiation of the outrage," and the clerical Vaterland denounced the inauguration as scandalous and as a fête worthy of the devil. The pope retired to his chapel and it is reported prayed for about three days. The latest news concerning the affair is that the Catholic societies of Rome will try to offset the demonstration by erecting a monument to St. Philip Neri, one of Loyola's co-conspirators, who died in Rome some five years before the church burnt Bruno, and was canonized some twenty-two years after.

We read these statements of the church's agony with inexpressible pleasure. It is impossible not to rejoice that the Romish church has lost the power which murdered Bruno, and which would kill with equal cruelty those who honor the dead Freethinker, and it is some satisfaction to know that she feels and writhes under the deprivation. Possibly she will learn humility, or at least to restrain the terrible thirst for blood, which, ignorant, intolerant, and cruel, she still has. We rejoice in her discomfiture, and at the loss of influence she has sustained in Italy. The statue of Bruno will, we hope, be to her a perpetual reminder of her fall. Like Colonel Ingersoll, we wish it were higher than the dome of St. Peter's.

Freethought in England in 1888–9.

Every year, about this time, the National Secular Society of England holds a Conference and, as it were, takes an account of stock to see where it stands, what it has done, and what it can do to further the cause of liberty to be irreligious. This year the Conference was held at the Hall of Science, London, on June 9th, the day the Freethinkers of Italy inaugurated the statue to Giordano Bruno.

About eighty delegates were present at the opening session, with friends and members of the society from some thirty other towns. The first business of the Conference was, on Mr. Bradlaugh's motion, to send a telegram to the committee of the Bruno monument, then engaged in unveiling the statue at Rome. After this, and the roll-call, and the reading of the minutes of the last conference, Mr. Bradlaugh read the report of the Executiv of the Society, which may be termed a Report of the Progress of Freethought in England for the past year. Considering the strict terms of the Society, it has been fairly prosperous, though the addition to the membership has not been so great as in some years past. Four hundred and ninety-two members hav been gained and five new branches authorized. The treasurer's report shows over £164 in the bank, made up of balances from the General, Propagandist, and Benevolent Funds. This latter fund has been found exceedingly useful, and the means of relieving much distress. English Freethinkers are urged therefore to make it much larger.

One very great gain has been made during the past year, which Mr. Bradlaugh is fully justified in congratulating the members upon, and that is an increase in the number of known Freethinkers elected to school boards, county councils, and other local bodies. This has enabled considerable justice to be done to Freethinkers in various places. Mrs. Besant has rendered very effectiv service in her position on the London school board in procuring the rescinding of the resolution forbidding our able contributor, Mr. Moss, to lecture on Freethought subjects. The society has also sent a missionary on lecturing tours. Mr. Foote visited several towns, forming new branches and encouraging old ones. He was followed by an agent of the Christian Evidence Society, and the opposition will be repeated if Mr. Foote goes out again, provided the faithful contribute the funds. The Secular Society ventures to express the hope that the faithful will do their duty, as the discussion ensuing from the agent's visits was beneficial to Freethought.

Propaganda work in London is supervised by the Federation of Branches. The Federation makes a special effort to distribute statements of the aims and objects of the Society, circulating at times as many as twenty thousand handbills throughout the city. It also organized a debate with the Christian Evidence Society, and arranged a course of Freethought lectures specially designed for the educational advantages of Liberal lectures. Friendly gatherings under the auspices of local branches were stimulated by the Federation, and the annual dinner, which was held in April, brought together nearly two hundred activ Freethinkers, and contributed not a little to the advancement of Secular principles. During the year the Society appointed as lecturer a former Unitarian minister of Darwen, who had outgrown his sect and found refuge in the philosophy of Freethought.

The most notable achievement of the Secularists during the year is of course the passage of the Oaths bill. Of this victory Mr. Bradlaugh says: "The hope expressed last year by your Executiv as to the Oaths bill has been more than verified. With the amendments submitted to your last Conference, and then unanimously approved by the members present, the bill passed, without alteration, through both Houses, and received the royal assent on 24th December last. The 'Oaths Act, 1888,' is noteworthy as being the first statute of this realm in which persons without religious belief hav ever been recognized as citizens to be legislated for. In all previous enactments such Freethinkers hav been treated as criminals to be punished, or as persons to be insulted. The 'Oaths Act, 1888,' placed persons without religious belief on exactly the same level as to affirmation as persons having religious belief. The act removes many disabilities to which Freethinkers hav been subjected for centuries. It enables such persons in Scotland to be competent as witnesses, which heretofore they were not. It repeals the statutes under which the inquisitorial and sometimes insulting queries and observations occurred to which Freethinking witnesses were liable in England, Wales, and Ireland. It takes away throughout the United Kingdom the disability theretofore attaching to Freethinking jurors. It enables persons without religious belief to affirm their allegiance whenever oath of allegiance might otherwise hav been required, and it renders impossible the repetition of the Parliamentary struggle, which lasted from 1880 to 1885. There being some misapprehension as to the affirmation of allegiance amongst soldiers, militiamen, and volunteers, the secretary for war has recently recorded his decision, in accordance with the Oaths act, and this is now circulated in 'Army Orders.'"

Reference is made to the erection of the Bruno statue, and credit is also given to the Paris Municipal Council for erecting a statue to Etienne Dolet in that city. Dolet, who was burnt in Paris August 3, 1546, as an Atheist, may be fairly ranked, says Mr. Bradlaugh, among Freethought martyrs. The statue was unveiled May 19th. Dolet was not an Atheist, and his theological works, previously burnt by order of parliament, constituted his crime. He was opposed to the church, but his opinions were more nearly those of Voltaire, who was born one hundred and three years after Dolet had been sacrificed to appease the malice of the church.

Turning to the continent, Freethought is found to be activ in Belgium and Sweden, though in the latter country bigotry is fully as alive. In Belgium a Freethought congress was held at Easter, and in Paris one is called for the week commencing September 15th. Regarding the blasphemy prosecutions in Sweden, with which TRUTH SEEKER readers are already familiar, Mr. Bradlaugh says: "Messrs. Lennstrand and Lindkvist, two Swedish Rationalists, hav proved very gallant defenders of the right of free speech. One of the survivals in Sweden of the intolerant bigotry which once disqualified Jews in this country was shown in the annulation of a verdict of 'not guilty' given for Lennstrand, the ground being that one of the jurors was a Jew. Mr. Lennstrand has several fresh prosecutions pending. He is undaunted by imprisonment, and travels through the country, often addressing meetings in private gardens when the police prohibited meetings in public places, and founding branches of the Utilitarian Society." A letter from the two brave men was also read, from which we extract a paragraph:

"The Christian foes of Freethought in Sweden do their utmost to crush us, but, thanks to their foolish proceedings, our ranks are daily increasing and consolidated. We feel sure that at last we shall conquer through perseverance and courage. The many sufferings sustained by you, your sacrifices and noble valor in the long struggle for human rights, deliverance, and happiness, urge us to try to equal you, and so the history of Utilism in Sweden shall become a sequel to the history of Secularism in England and elsewhere. The suffocating reactionary and clerical atmosphere which prevails in this country is insufferable, but the valorous example of Bradlaugh, Annie Besant, Foote, and many others in the glorious army of Freethought, fire those who are awake to do something in order to gain what they are yearning for: a better time, with happier and freer conditions. To attain this we liv, fight, and die."

Aside from the bigotry of the church, the discouraging feature of last year's work is the apathy prevailing among the Freethinkers at large. This is due to the Irish agitation, and other political interests. Not a little is due, too, to the lack of persecution from the English Christians. There are a good many Infidels in England, as there are in this country, who take no activ part in the movement unless some Freethinker is in jail or on the way there. The Irish question over there is much like the Henry George movement here; it supplies a subject of discussion for men of advanced tendencies, and they drop all other matters to become political economists. When the excitement has subsided they will return to their first and most important love. Other reasons why the English Freethinkers hav not gained more strength are found in defectiv details of organization. The greatest loss occasioned by these things is the inadequate support given the movement for the repeal of the blasphemy laws. Mr. Bradlaugh raised the issue on the first day of the session, obtaining first place for his bill. The second reading was fixed for March 20th. In consequence of governmental exigencies that date was taken from private members, and it was not until April 14th that a decisiv vote was had on the bill, when it was lost by 143 to 48. The pictures in the Freethinker, Mr. Bradlaugh thinks, told heavily against the bill, as they excited much religious prejudice. From the present Parliament there is scarcely any prospect of obtaining the repeal of the laws. The Freethinkers themselvs did not work very heartily for the measure, only eight thousand and odd signatures being obtained to the petitions for it, and of these about one-half were from religious sources. This was not a creditable showing, Mr. Bradlaugh says, and because of it he had some hesitation about again accepting the presidency of the society, thinking that perhaps the members' disposition to work with him had somewhat slackened. But his unanimous reëlection shows that it was not because of his personality that the petitions were not pushed, but through general apathy, laziness, and don't-care spirit. We are glad to say that in pushing petitions against ecclesiastical lawmaking the Freethinkers of this country did much better last spring than their English brethren; and the opportunity to do it again will undoubtedly be presented this coming fall. The Blair Sunday and Educational bills are not killed yet..

The death of Alice Bradlaugh, and the necessarily consequent withdrawal during her illness of her sister, compelled the closing of the Science Classes, and they cannot be resumed, as each year they hav been a source of expense to Mrs. Besant and Mr. Bradlaugh, who do not feel able to bear it longer. These classes were founded ten years ago, and their results hav been in the highest degree creditable to both scholars and teachers. It is a source of regret that their maintenance is impossible.

Mr. Bradlaugh was reëlected president; R. Forder, secretary; and W. H. Reynolds, treasurer. Beyond the election of officers the work of the conference was mostly technical. The principal discussion was on how to further spread Freethought, with as satisfactory results as such deliberations usually bring. Every delegate had a method of his own, and the sensible course of leaving it to the executiv was finally adopted. The evening session was given up to speeches, and our contributor Mr. Moss, Mr. Foote, of the Freethinker, Mr. Standring, of the Radical, Mrs. Besant, and others made short speeches, which were duly appreciated by the large audience. Mr. Bradlaugh closed the conference with a speech, the first part of which we commend especially to American Freethinkers, the last part to those gentry of the "pale phantom" order who imagin that iconoclasm has no part in the emancipation of the world. Mr. Bradlaugh said:

"We hav heard to-night, in different voices, different things on which I will say a word or two. We hav been told that because the statue to Bruno is unveiled the papacy is unable to hold its own. We are told that Christianity is dying. We are told that Freethinkers are flagging. We are told that Freethought is progressing. Yes; it is progressing. But I am not so sure as to the papacy being unable to hold its own. I wish I were. I am not sure that the papacy is not stronger now than it was four hundred years ago. The great fight between Freethought and orthodoxy is yet to come, and in that fight the papacy will stand for orthodoxy. The Church of England is nearer to the papacy now than it was two hundred years ago. Disestablishment will but make the papacy stronger. And though I am in favor of disestablishment, though I hope to take part in disestablishment, I do not hide from myself that disestablishment will strengthen the Roman Catholic church, and will bring advanced Freethought face to face with the most terrible foe of liberty. There were huge difficulties in fighting fifty, sixty, seventy, eighty years ago. Then Freethinkers had to fight for the right to only think aloud. Now it is for us to learn to use the right which was won for us by them; won also for many who do greater work than we, but whose work is made possible by us. Education, Science, Art, take five millions now, where fifty years ago they did not take fifty thousand pounds. Science works ever, not so much by lecturing in halls, nor by speech in field and street, but by the constant chipping away of old prejudices, the breaking down of old beliefs. Christianity is dying if we measure its death agony by thousands of years, though not if we measure it by hours and weeks and months. It dies as the glacier melts, crushing much with its cold rigidity while it is melting. I hav no right to boast of the part I hav taken in the great Freethought battle, for the fight has given me a place that I could not otherwise hav won. I do not mean the place in which I now work month by month, but a place which is cut into the page of the history of this century, cut not deep, but deeper at least than the names of those who strove to bar my way. By myself I could not hav done this; it was the cause for which I battled that made me strong. Word has been spoken here to-night of Bruno, of Bruno whose statue unveiled to-day marks his triumph on the spot where he died. Bruno, and men like Bruno, are not those to whom our grateful recognition should be chiefly paid; he had the reward of coming out in the light of history, and though his last look was on a sea of hostil faces, yet he looked the whole world in the face and died in full sight of men. The really hard struggle is when a man is driven down, unnoticed, unknown, uncared for. Bruno's name lightens like a beacon-flame across the centuries; but there were hundreds of forgotten dead, hundreds who went to jail, poor men, unknown men, men without whom the struggle for a free press identified with the name of Richard Carlile could not hav been. Movements are not made by men and women; it is the movement that makes the men, carrying them in front of it as some huge wave bears the boat to the shore. I, to whom you hav given the duty of being standard-bearer for you in the fight, and who hope that I may say this night that I hold it up a little higher than ever it has been held in this land before—I can only do it because Richard Carlile paid his nearly nine years of jail to buy the standing-place on which I now stand. There are some who may think more truly than we; some who may think more deeply; some whose thought may range more widely; for those who fight in the whirl of the battle, striking blow after blow, cannot always see the exact spot on which the builder's trowel may best be laid and the bricks be most precisely set. Huxley, Darwin, Tyndall, are building where we broke, but without our work theirs would be impossible. We may be rough as we work with bar and pick in our overthrowing; but our roughness has smoothed for them a place whence they can challenge not one religion only, but all the religions of the world."

At this distance, and judging from the report of the conference, the leaders of English Freethought hav done their duty and done it well during the year. The Oaths bill alone, though not all we could wish, is of itself a triumph splendid and practical. The supporters of the party hav perhaps loitered a little by the way, especially to be regretted in the matter of repealing the blasphemy laws, but on the whole the year has been a profitable one for progress, as any year must be in which even one penalty is removed from Freethinking. We extend to our brethren over the water the assurance of our interest in their welfare and joy at their victories.

We Giv the Devil His Due.

Two very much respected friends write:

"Do you think it wise to keep flinging mud at Wanamaker, even if he did raise a fund with which to buy corrupt Democrats to save the country from the discredit of another Cleveland administration? Do you know of any Democrats who sold out to Wanamaker? If you do not, why insult the intelligence of your Republican and Democratic readers by insinuating that he was a party to their corruption? Can you reasonably expect to keep your Republican subscribers, and they constitute the great majority with us? Giv Wanamaker a rest and the devil his due, and you will retain friends; but, in parting, why not mention that Wanamaker divides profits with his employees? Possibly such flings hav not tended to the post-office department's being over anxious to carry through mail to you that THE TRUTH SEEKER may find a larger audience."

Our friends ought to know by this time that we care very little about ordinary politics, and hav no preference between the two ruling parties. References to Mr. Wanamaker hav not been for the reason that he is a Republican. We do not care for that. Nor hav we found fault with him because he is pious. That is his business. What we hav criticised is his use of his office to force his religious observances upon the people, of whom he is theoretically but a hired servant. He appoints men to office not because of their fitness or the desire of the people to hav them, but because they are religious. He has put the public to much inconvenience by his Sunday rules in the department at Washington, and he is trying to do away with all mail service one day in each week because his religion regards that day as "sacred." He is uniting church and state, with the church in the first place. Here is another instance of his zeal for Jesus:

"WASHINGTON, June 16th.—From all over the West there comes an outcry against the carrying of the postmaster-general's Sabbatarian fad into the administration of the Star route mail service. Senator Plumb, who has passed most of his time since the adjournment of Congress within easy reach of Washington, is fairly overwhelmed with protests, and every mail is adding to the number received by other accessible senators. The Sunday service is a great feature to the people along the far-reaching routes extending through Dakota, Montana, and other thickly populated territories soon to be made states, and also through Nebraska, Kansas, a great part of Missouri, Texas, Arkansas, Colorado, and other states.

"The people of these communities think more of their Sunday mail delivery than that of any other day of the week, and Mr. Wanamaker's attempt to cut them off from civilization on the first day of the week is raising a storm of disapproval. Wanamaker has directed that all contracts for the Star route service (which is the main service in the West) shall be advertised for six days only. In some instances where, by inadvertence, the advertisments hav called for seven days' service, he has ordered a re-advertising. The storm which this arbitrary puritanical action is raising in the West is only just beginning to be felt here, but the breezes will blow after awhile."

Wanamaker seems to regard the postal department as his to do with as he pleases; and to support his religion he is endeavoring to deprive the people in the Northwest of their regular mail service. That is, he is forcing his Sabbatarian notions on the country regardless of the wishes of anyone but the Christians. His church is running his department of the government. This is against all Liberal principles, and we hav protested and shall continue to protest against this practical union of church and state. And if Mr. Wanamaker were a Democrat we imagin our friends would also protest pretty loudly. But because he is of their party they close their eyes to his flagrant violation of the principles of our government. We hope never to be so strongly wedded to any party as not to be the very first to criticise it when that party does wrong.

We do not care to discuss Mr. Wanamaker's personal business, though even on that we could enlighten our friends somewhat. Neither do we consider the Republican party as more corrupt than the Democratic party. There is really no issue between the two parties except as to who shall hav the offices. The tariff issue was a scare on the part of one party, and accepted by the other in the hope that it would prove a winning card. The Republicans had previously proposed to scale the tariff down lower than the Democrats thought of doing.

Our objections to Mr. Wanamaker are solely based on his prostitution of his office to gain a point for religion. And if because of these objections our friends think Mr. Wanamaker's department might delay mail matter directed to this office, they hav very funny conceptions of the power and duty of our officials. Is the post-office Mr. Wanamaker's private property, or does it belong to all the people? Or is it a missionary institution for the propagation of the Christian religion and the support of zealous Christians? Wanamaker seems to so regard it; but that is just what we deny and protest against. Shall our Western subscribers wait till Monday to get their TRUTH SEEKER, when they might hav it on Sunday, just because Mr. Wanamaker personally regards Sunday as a holy day? What sections of our Constitution and statutes make the church's regard for a certain day superior to the wishes of the people? And why should a man who believes in Secular government condone religious usurpation simply because the usurper is a member of his political party?

ONE of the best of S. P. Putnam's lectures is "The Glory of Infidelity." He has now published it in an exceedingly pretty pamphlet, adding to it a poem on Thomas Paine, which sells for ten cents. Address Putnam & Macdonald, 504 Kearny street, San Francisco, Cal.

THE Tribune accuses the Women's Christian Union of bribing the voters of Pennsylvania with coffee, tea, sandwiches, and buttermilk, and says it is a custom which ought to be checked, for "it is quite as immoral to bribe a voter with a sandwich or a cup of coffee as with a glass of beer."

THE Christian Advocate mentions the burning of several churches by lightning, including a Methodist building, and says, "it is one of the most appalling of phenomena, but not beyond the control of divine providence." This seems to saddle the blame on God; but if he is directing the lightning what in the world is he hitting the churches for? Is he angry at the brethren for their hypocrisy and sinfulness?

A HITHERTO unpublished letter from Garibaldi was read at the Bruno banquet at Rome. It was dated Caprera, June 20, 1875, when the project of a monument to Bruno was first mooted, and inclosed a subscription with warm words of approval for the object. Purchasers of the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for this year are familiar with the appearance of this statue. It surmounts a very handsome monumental pedestal, around which are placed festooned medallions of other heroes and martyrs, Aon Paleario, M. Serveto, T. Campanella, P. Ramus, P. Sarpi, Huss, Wicliffe, and J. C. Vanini. On three sides occupying the same space as the inscription to Bruno are bas-reliefs representing Bruno at the University of Oxford, before the Inquisition, and at the stake. The whole monument, those say who hav seen it, reflects the utmost credit upon Signor Ferrari, the designer and sculptor.

Letters from Friends.

GUNNISON, COL., June 18, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Your paper is a good one and I will not do without it. I am yours always for reason, truth, and science. A. MOYER.

ORANGE, MASS., June 20, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: To Mr. W. M. Chapman I would say: The answer to my first query I consider correct, but you hav not answered the second. I did not ask whether the influence of the earth on other celestial bodies was decreased in proportion to distance, but whether that influence finally became absolutely nil. The question at issue is: Is not the influence of the earth infinit in extension, according to the principle that division cannot ultimately annihilate force?

H. W. HAMMOND.

CRESCO, IA., June 16, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me catalog of books. I hav tried hard to add to your list of subscribers, but without success. I cannot touch this superstition-soaked community with anything that might put common sense into godlike craniums. Let me assure you that, from sky-pilots and my religious family, I receive an abundance of Christian hell. With the latter I would like to liv in peace if it were possible under the circumstances, but the former I will fight while I draw breath. Some avoid me, others abuse, but all hate me. Yours, etc., F. L. DAUBERSMITH.

BRONSON, FLA., June 7, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed twenty-five cents, for which send me "Pioneer Pith," by Robert C. Adams.

I am so sorry for God that I think we ought to keep a penitential service for him. He seems to be so much abused, and his children present such sad sights in their petty squabbles over the five points of Calvinism, Episcopacy, and papistry that I am afraid it has gone to his brain, and he has commenced, like a man on a continued debauch, to smash his property for his own amusement, or else he would never hav played football with his five temples in Johnstown, and gathered so many of his good ones at once to his embrace.

Yours truly, W. C. FERRIDAY.

BRUSHTON, N. Y., June 21, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me "Bible Inquirer," by A. Jacobson; "The Logic of Death," by J. G. Holyoake; "Materialism," by Dr. Louis Büchner, and "The Atonement," by Chas. Bradlaugh.

I am more than pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER and the ANNUAL. A year ago I was a Roman Catholic in pretty good standing, but by reading Catholic books I began to doubt, and continued to doubt, until I got THE TRUTH SEEKER, when all my doubts were at an end.

I would like to ask your opinion of the practice of blessing the throats of little children as a protection against sore throats, etc. It is practiced to quite an extent in the Catholic churches in this vicinity. GEO. S. CROSSMEN.

WEST BRIGHTON, N. Y., June 9, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Within find inclosed my mite for the grand old TRUTH SEEKER, that I may enjoy its blessings every Sunday. I think it would hav been more to Mr. J. Christ's reputation if he had originated similar teachings. He might hav meant well enough, but he certainly taught some singular things. I think the inspiration of THE TRUTH SEEKER far more reliable than the inspiration of God's inspired word. I think God had a good opportunity to display his mighty power he boasts of in stopping the mighty storms that flooded out Pennsylvania There was a good chance to display his mighty power. If he ever fed five thousand on two small fish and a few cakes, there's a chance for him to return and do a mighty work. Then I would feel like giving him all the glory, honor, and thanks, wouldn't you? But I advise them not to wait for his generosity.

Remember you hav my sincere prayers.

SAMUEL E. SKINNER.

DAYTON, O., June 16, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: The recent results at Johnstown, Pa., appear to be a good theme for philosophers to philosophize upon, for philanthropists to gain an immortal name by, and for theologians to theorize upon, illustrating the "watchful care" of that fellow with the "smiling face" that is eternally hidden behind a frowning providence; that ever thoughtful and gracious myth that "even noteth the fall of the sparrows;" that unknown quantity of unknown quality said to be the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.

When man recognizes in full that he is subject to the laws of the universe, the same as the universe itself, and that he will wisely, after having gained the necessary wisdom, consider those laws so far as he can understand them, casualties will be reduced in just that proportion, and myths will be relegated so much farther toward a much-to-be-desired oblivion. The laws of absorption, disintegration, repulsion, and attraction work unceasingly. And, no matter how long the time required, in the end the result is obtained. In the case of the reservoir at Johnstown, the laws of decomposition and absorption had been in operation since the foundation was first laid. The law of repulsion had continually operated against the masonry and woodwork, and it only required the law of attraction to bring down rain-drops in quantity sufficient to force the already partly disintegrated dam from its foundation and flood the country below. Investigate all things with truth as the sole object. For one to suppose that a God had anything to do with the calamity at Johnstown, is too silly for a moment's consideration. It was slowly but surely brought about by nature's law, and the sooner man recognizes the fact the better it will be for himself and posterity. Public instructors, school-teachers, should be furnished with an easy and simple manual for the promulgation of nature's laws, and be required to teach them in all schools, to the end that children may not grow up in ignorance of what nature requires and always obtains. Such a course would banish superstition almost, if not altogether, in a single generation. B.

LAKE SHORE, UTAH, June 22, E.M. 289.

MR. EDITOR: The Freethinkers of Lake Shore hav been again called upon to mourn the loss of one of their number in the death of Mrs. Harriett Brooks, the beloved wife of our amiable and energetic leader, H. S. Brooks, who died at her residence, June 16, E.M. 289, aged fifty-six years. Mrs. Brooks was a true Freethinker in every sense of the word, and her request was that she be interred purely on Freethought principles, wishing no Christian minister to speak over her remains. She was an affectionate mother of four living sons, all of whom imbibed her sentiments. She was much respected both by Liberals and Christians alike. At 3 o'clock, P.M., on the 17th inst., Mr. Thomas Dallen, of Springville, conducted the funeral services in accordance with the wish of the departed. His remarks were very appropriate and to the point. He finished by reading Ingersoll's oration upon death and immortality. A large concourse of both Freethinkers and Christians followed her remains to their last resting-place, and a few appropriate remarks by Mr. Dallen closed the services. And so another dear sister and friend of humanity has passed to the great unknown. M. M. CREER.

DES MOINES, IA., June 22, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose, for publication, the official names of the Des Moines Secular Union: J. Pitman, president; R. L Lunt and Mrs. D. H. Cross, vice-presidents; A. M. Foster, treasurer; F. Steiner, recording secretary; H. L. Perkins, financial secretary; N. Zediker, D. H. Cross, and Mrs. N. Zediker, corresponding secretaries. Regular meetings every Sunday evening at 8 o'clock, in Forster's Hall, 504 Walnut street. The organization is only three months old, but it has been growing in interest from the very first, and effort is being made to build upon a foundation that will insure perpetuity and gradual development. Conscious of the strong current against us, we would be content, even, to retain our present membership for a time, though I am pleased to note that the Union is steadily growing in numbers as well as in interest. It is patent to every thinking mind that the permanent existence of Liberal organizations is necessary, hence every Liberal-minded person should encourage the up-building of the same, for, although they may consist of but few members, those few will be more thoroughly informed and the better qualified to impart knowledge and to meet the arguments of the Christian world.

If you will forward TRUTH SEEKERS at any time, I will distribute them and make effort to get subscribers.

N. ZEDIKER, Cor. Sec. Des Moines Secular Union.

ALLIANCE, O., June 20, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel addressed good audiences in Alliance, O., June 9th, morning and evening, also Tuesday evening, June 11th. Mrs. Krekel is one of our most able speakers, and all who heard her were highly pleased. To say Mrs. Krekel thoroughly understands her subjects, and handles them to the satisfaction of the most rigid critic, would be putting it in a mild form. We recommend her to the Liberals of this country as one of the most able and social lady orators on the Liberal platform, and suggest that when convenient to do so Liberals throughout the land should engage her services, and not allow an opportunity to pass to listen to her able and ladylike arguments in behalf of humanity.

The Liberals of this place are in good working order, and are now engaged in trying to encourage Liberals in other neighboring cities to organize, so that when Liberal speakers can be had we can use them at different points to advantage. Thus we can save so much expensiv travel from one engagement to another. Liberals, wake up and organize to protect our rights against the encroachments of orthodoxy, or we may hav a large-sized God in our national Constitution that will be more ornamental than useful to all classes, except to that class who sail round through space catching souls and consigning them to eternal torment to gratify their proposed Constitutional God. Once more we must urge you to be on the alert. Engage such women as Mrs. Krekel to lecture on woman's equality before the law, and God in the Constitution, and help to spread the light. And, what is better still, after you hav done all this subscribe for the New York TRUTH SEEKER and help Brother Macdonald to spread the Heston picture gallery all over the land. D. W. SMITH.

MARVIN, June 16, 289.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to make a few remarks concerning our paper, etc. In the first place, the reason that I hav not remitted sooner is just this. I am acquainted with several Freethinkers in and around this town, and hav received from some of them a partial promis to subscribe, and so waited in hopes. But when I made a final appeal they pleaded that it took too much money—it was too costly a paper, and they would hav to defer to some future time. And now, Mr. Editor and the Truth Seeker Company, I think they were not far from the correct idea.

When Mr. Bennett saw fit in his great heart to increase the size of the paper I thought it was a financial error. It was very trying to some of his best friends, but they came to the scratch like men. Sister Finch of Nebraska sounds the keynote in her letter in the last issue, where she says: "We are not living, but just holding on, ready to drop." This is the condition of all the great Western states. There is just one kind of institution flourishing now—that is the three-per-cent scalping shops, called banks. They take from three to ten per cent per month interest, and money cannot be procured anywhere else Now, the original size of the paper was fair and the price not beyond the reach of the poor. Now, my brethren, there is not a Freethinker in the United States that desires the success of the cause more than your humble servant. And if I am wrong in this view of the case it is not a fault but an error of judgment.

I believe it will increase the number of subscribers, so that your income will be equal to what it is now, and will put your paper in many more hands, which is the most to be desired. Giv us eight or ten pages of well-digested matter and I think the great majority will be satisfied with corresponding price. If then there are any rich Freethinkers in our ranks that want to do more, they can just put the other dollar in books or tracts. I do not often write letters to my brethren, and if any can show that I am wrong, I will haul down my colors.

There are many persons writing long communications to our papers trying to prove this ism or that ism or something or other that could just as well be left out. If a man or woman has anything good let them put it in book shape and let it go on its own merits—not but that nearly all that appears in THE TRUTH SEEKER is true, but some of it appears to me to be very thin. Let THE TRUTH SEEKER be a Freethought newspaper with one page of "Letters from Friends" boiled down. Don't, my dear brethren, take up a whole or two columns or more trying to wreak a little revenge on some one. This is valuable space, remember. If somebody pitches into me for writing this letter they must not think I am coming back at them, for I won't. I want somebody that has a good word, a little logic, or a little encouragement, to occupy said space. S. M. TRAVIS.

OREGON, MO., June 20, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Our orthodox Protestants get involved in trouble when they proffer the holy Bible as authority as badly as do the Romanists about the authority of their church or their pope. They must either claim every line of every book as infallible, or giv it up. The Romanists had to fall back on the fundamental points, and admit that church and pope were infallible only when uttering fundamentals. So do our modern heretics or Protestants say our Bible is infallible only when it utters things that are fundamental.

We believe thus and so because holy scripture declares it, and holy scripture is infallible.

Question. What—infallible in all things or only in fundamentals? Answer. In fundamentals only.

Q. Then on other points scripture may err? A. Yes, it may.

Q. And do you know what things are fundamental or not? A. No, and therefore I believe scripture in all things lest I should disbelieve it on some fundamental point.

Q. How do you know then whether this be a fundamental point or no? A. I do not know.

Q. It may then be non-fundamental for all you know? A. Yes, it may be so.

Q. And on a non-fundamental scripture may err, you said? A. Certainly, I so said.

Q Then it may err in this? A. Yes, it may.

Q. Then what certainty hav you that scripture does not err in this matter you are holding as most essential? A. None whatever, but upon the supposition that the matter is fundamental.

Q. And of this supposition you are uncertain? A. Yes, I told you so before.

Q. So you can hav no certainty of that which depends on this uncertainty, save only a supposition—if it be true? In plain English, you are sure it is true if it is true?

It was in that way Chillingworth "did up" his opponent, but in doing so he upheaved from its foundations all of his own faith. The poor opponent was obliged to reply that he himself did not know what was fundamental, for if he did he himself was the infallible, and no pope or church was necessary. Now the holy Bible has been put in place of church. The Protestant is bound to say he also does not know, for if he did there is no use for scripture.

There is no evasion; the whole of scripture must be taken as infallibly true or away goes the whole structure. Reason has no place, nor has manhood or sanity. The sole reply is the baby's or the fool's, viz: "It's true because 'tis."

HOLT.

STEUBENVILLE, O., June 16, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I sometimes despair of the world ever being what it might become, a desirable place to liv in for the whole mass of the people, while selfishness is the ruling motiv of the best of us, and while even as well-meaning a man as Mr. A. Carnegie cannot see that the interests of all would be best served by the employers uniting with the employed to keep up a fair remuneration for work done. If instead of crying out, "Oh, we can't compete with so and so, who has forced his workmen to work for less than we are paying," they would unite with the workmen to compel the delinquent employers to pay fair wages or stop; to say to them, "We are responsible for the welfare of these men from whose labor we gather our wealth, and we propose that they shall receive a fair day's wages for a fair day's work, and will not allow you to ruin both us and them by grinding your men down to starvation wages," how much better would this be than to reduce all to their level! How soon this would break the feeling of ill will that exists between labor and capital!

As regards the importation of foreign labor there are two causes. One is the mean employer, who is resolved to break down wages at all hazards. The other is that the Catholic church, the greatest enemy of the people that exists in the world, is adding to her strength to break down all barriers to her universal power by every ignorant foreigner that lands on our shores. And so long as we allow them to vote at any time after they arrive so long will that greatest of all despot, isms continue to cause swarms of its most ignorant dupes to come over here and take the places of our own citizens who hav been educated at the expense of the state, so that intelligence and not ignorance should cast the ballots, on which depends the welfare of the country, indeed, the very salvation of our republican institutions. Let the universal motto be, No more ballots in the hands of foreigners, and we shall beat down both the power of the sordid employer to reduce the wages of his workmen and forever scotch the power of the Catholic church to undermine our republican institutions.

I cannot help but notice the difference between the treatment of the Anarchists' case and that of the Clan-na-Gael by the great mass of the newspapers. They hounded the poor Anarchists to death without a particle of evidence that they had committed any overt act, and the Methodist preachers would be satisfied with nothing less than their blood; and though the principal bloodhound, Blondell the policeman, has been proved a blackmailer and disgraced, they still slander the memory of those martyrs to the cry of mad dog. But not a word in an editorial of the leading papers, except a few, against the outrageous crime of the Clan-na-Gael. Oh, no! they are Irish and serfs of the pope and hav votes. It would not do for the politicians to offend them, so all they hav to say of Mr. Sullivan is, "What a brave, cool man he is! What a manly man he proved himself by submitting to be arrested!" etc. It is sickening to read the praise of these men who could decoy one of their own countrymen to his death and butcher him like an ox or a hog, depending no doubt, upon their priest to wipe out the sin and giv them absolution at the last. Ought such men to be admitted as citizens of these states, who take no oath without a reservation that they obey the pope or his priests before all else, even to betray their own as well as their adopted country, if the priest demands it? Let the motto of all lovers of their country be, No more suffrage for any foreigner. Keep them from voting and you destroy the venomous sting of the church.

JOHN DOWNES.

CHICAGO, ILL., May 30, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: It should be the great desire and aim of every patriot of civilization to promote truth and justice at all times, and only those who hav souls that can feel for others as well as for themselvs are worthy of being classed as patriots. In this age of great progress, surrounded by many faiths, dogmas, and creeds, is the time for those who love the truth better than their own lives, to break away from the confines of any set opinions, and, with the helmet of justice secured to their person draw the sword of proof against every cruel creed that can be proved false, and slay the revengeful tyrants of superstition upon every side.

"Truth is mighty and must prevail" is an old adage, but which for years has been proved false, or has been rusting away its intended truthfulness amid the dark ages of controling ignorance. We know not how long it is to remain before the mighty arm of political and religious power is to be made weak by the advance of science and pure motivs, for as long as the great mass of mankind are kept in ignorance, and held in the control of the cunning machinations of a few, so long will truth and justice hav to breathe the stifling air of fraud and dominion.

Ignorance is the chain that binds the mind to the idols of preconceived opinions, and can only be broken by the spread of intelligence coupled with virtue. The same ignorance fills our prisons and asylums with the poor deluded victims of misguided control; the same is the parent of the olden banner that has been floated high above the heads of the timid, having written on its face the damnable words, "Turncoat," to intimidate the weak and ignorant from leaving the fold of some party or creed, and to hold them in submission. Such is the stigma to be seen on the foreheads of the non-progressiv, who would obstruct the pathway of the more aspiring who would seek a higher level of moral and judicial worth. How are we, then, as patriots to the truth, who would know of nature and her laws, and how to best conform to such laws in order to reap the greatest possible benefit, to shake off the superstitious fears of our forefathers and climb the ladder of progression without stint or hindrance? The masses must be educated, not alone in the common branches of learning, but be taught to think and reason within themselvs that they may break away from every tie that binds them to creeds or opinions, and with minds unprejudiced seek more advanced ideas of known truths. How can we best do this? is one of the great questions of the day.

Money is power, and has for ages been accumulating in the church treasury of the world until her millions outnumber the hairs of our head; her devotees hav been forced by fraud and favor to giv to the Lord; her power is nearly supreme; her precepts most vile; her Jesuitical oaths most terrible. So in a great degree most other creed-loving denominational sects of religious and political partisans. Again is asked, How can we best turn the tide of erring nature? We hav able men in the lecture field, fearless editors dispensing words of truth that those who need may learn, many Liberal-minded filling high positions in our schools and colleges, even from some of our pulpits are being issued great progressiv truths, and while the speakers are advocates of fallacious mythology, they are honest and willing to accept truth as fast as it is unfolded to them. Still the great mass are uncared for, and remain in ignorant bliss, easy victims of the wily who are ever seeking their downfall. Many will not attend the lectures of the despised Infidels, are ashamed to be seen reading Secular papers or attend church where liberal thoughts are expressed. So bigoted are many that they dare not think different from their ancestors or preceptors, and fear that old scarecrow, "Turncoat." But few business men of our country really believe in church, creed, or the divinity of Christ, but are ignorant of the real facts, and continue to support the church for the sake of wife and children, believing the church to be the only promoter of good morals, when the reverse is true. This is the class we must rescue, the careless and unthoughtful. How are we to do it? is again asked. My answer is, to sow the seeds of truth, in small quantities, but well over the land, that the beautiful flowers of virtue can be seen and the perfumed air breathed by the unthinking, unaware of their presence, for if sown in large quantities the whole will be pulled up and burnt by the watchful deceivers of men.

The Liberal class are said to be financially unable to oil the troubled waters of sectarian fraud sufficiently to enable the great ship of scientific truth to pass over the vast sea of superstition, but can we not unite in putting before the youth, the thoughtless, the honest, and even the denominational saint such tracts as will bring our whole country under missionary control, not such as placed before the heathens of other lands, that hav proved such a curse instead of a blessing, but such as will put confidence in the breast of every individual, and make them know that to do right is justifiable, that error cannot be forgiven—tracts that will improve upon the Sermon on the Mount, such as can be printed at small cost and distributed free by those interested in doing good? The standard of intelligence will be raised many fold in a short time. Show up the records of the past, giving the principles and misdoings of those who hav lived by faith in the supernatural, instead of relying upon their own independence. Build up as well as tear down; let the lecturers, the editors, and the reformers of all classes keep at work, and, in addition to these, raise a fund for printing selected missionary tracts, in large quantities, to flood the country and educate the people. An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. Our people are naturally honest, but avaricious, and think more of wealth and powers, coupled with public favor, than to know the truth and be guided thereby.

Could not the Freethinkers of America subscribe liberally, according to their means, to secure an establishment of our own to print vast quantities of tracts, selected by a chosen committee from among the good Liberals of our nation, and mail to each locality—to true and noble workers—tracts in circular form, such as will enlighten the great mass and bring about such a soul-cheering revival of Freethought as was never before known?

The church is fast seizing the reins of temporal control and we will soon be inclosed within the walls of its vengeance. Shall we remain idle and be content with what we are now doing, until again folded within the pythonic coils of ecclesiastical power? Or will we guard and protect the individuality of this great free republic before it is everlastingly too late? Men must be taught to forsake party and creed and unite for one common interest of protection, lest the deceiving politico-religio factions of party strife continue in the future, like the past, to defraud us of our just rights as free and independent citizens. The ignorant masses are being imposed upon by perfumed words and promises of pretended reformers, and thereby vote away their legal rights until at last, when too late, we will find ourselvs in the power of our enemies, who are filling their coffers from off our misguided, but honest, errors, and we, the common people, made slaves and dupes to their wishes. The churches control the political parties, and the political parties the people.

What is the remedy, but to educate the people to do their own thinking, to work and vote accordingly? To this end let us keep our lecturers and editors at work; purify our public schools; flood our land with short but meritorious statistical records of the past, together with scientific truths as developed from the great storehouse of nature; disprove the fallacious theories of mythology; drive delusion from our midst, that the real may be known. Seek to know from whence we came, and not throw the blame of undeveloped nature upon some supposed deity of whom nothing is known, but teach that each is the author of his or her own worth.

A. D. SWAN.

PORTSMOUTH, O., June 23, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: This week finds our city all torn up over the removal of two of the most efficient teachers of her public schools, one a pure and noble young lady, Miss Kate Kinney, who is fighting the battle of life alone, and the other, a widow, Mrs. Nellie Reiniger, with three helpless children upon her hands. Their friends are discouraged and the public are indignant. Their services were dispensed with, without notice, and without charges of any kind. Locked up in a secluded room, skulking from the sight of the world, the board of education, composed of church deacons, Knights Templar, and believers in the Presbyterian God and the Confession of Faith, declared these noble, pure, and good women's services dispensed with. The members of the board hav satisfied their wounded pride, and now offer up to their "almighty friend" prayers, beseeching mercy and aid for the helpless ones they hav cast aside. It causes me to say, "O consistency! thou art a jewel!"

I must not forget the Seventh Day Adventists, who are exhibiting under canvas spread on a vacant lot in the east end of the city. They hav figured it out that the time for the second coming of Christ was up in 1844. The Millerites set this same year for the destruction of the world, and ascension robes were prepared by many of them. As a result of this "second coming" scheme one person has become crazed. His name is James Smallridge, and he now occupies an apartment in the Athens Asylum, having been sent there Saturday. He came to Portsmouth a comparativ stranger. He visited the Adventists' tent, commonly called the "Cotton" church, one night, and the following day was raving mad on religion. Whether the Adventists unbalanced him or not I am unable to say. At any rate, he roamed about the city proclaiming their doctrin. He was locked up by the police, and in his cell he frantically raved. He said he was as old as Methuselah; that there was only one true God; that there were two devils, but he had massacred one; that the police who turned the key upon him would be damned, and that he expected Christ on the first train. Thus it is seen that religious insanity is but an unhappy mixture of faith and ignorance.

The so-called elders who are advancing the Adventist doctrin hav been visited by several of the Freethinking gentlemen of Portsmouth, who find that they come no nearer solving the mysteries of life and death than the reverends of other denominations. One young man handed them a list of impossibilities found in the Bible. They refrained from answering on the spot, and said they would preach a sermon explaining them away. As yet the sermon has not resounded on the evening air.

"We are in our last days," said an Adventist. "Christ can be expected at any hour, at any moment."

"It seems to me that he has boarded a late train," retorted an unbelieving man, when a wit standing close by dropped in the remark: "The probability is he was on one of the trains in the Johnstown washout. His father forsook him as in the first coming, and didn't make the waves run uphill. That would hav been a bully place for Lambert to hav shown Bob Ingersoll how easy it is for water to climb a mountain."

A few evenings since a furniture factory in this city was entirely consumed by fire, the owner of which is superintendent of a Sabbath-school. Across the street was a saloon, and within a stone's throw was Brown's liquor store. A passer-by appropriately remarked: "The flames devour. The Sunday-school superintendent's property burns as well as that of the Infidel. And in this case liquor establishments are left standing as mementoes of God's goodness and mercy to those who follow him and do his bidding, I suppose."

WILL B. ANDRES.

MARTINSBURG, W. VA., June 16, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: As a friend of Freethought and a reader of your interesting paper, I desire to contribute for publication some more of my views of the great question of life and death. As I grow older, the more I am convinced that the great Freethought movement is the only means to insure complete individual liberty. This conviction springs from my own experience, observation, and knowledge. I hav come to be an individualist. I take my lessons from no man or collection of men; I think for myself, and act accordingly. There ought to be no followers, but all leaders. I want no man or woman to follow me unless they think for themselvs. Then all can be leaders. Christianity is made up of followers—those who fear to think, and accept anything without demanding proof. Of course all people hav the same right to believe as they please; all hav equal rights, and to protect and preserve the personal rights of all is the object and aim of Liberalism.

One Liberal friend in South Dakota, writing to me, says Freethought in itself will not lead us to the goal. He insists that the wrongs of labor must be righted first. That mental liberty is not of much benefit when labor is so poorly paid. He is in favor of the single tax as the remedy. I admit his logic. The condition of labor in this country is deplorable. But I cannot see how labor is to be emancipated. Capital is so strongly intrenched and so powerful that it seems to be monarch of all it surveys. Labor is helpless simply because it cannot cope with capital. Nothing can be done but by universal and complete organization of labor. It is growing more and more a tremendous problem. But, like all other problems under the inexorable natural law, it will be the survival of the fittest. The condition of humanity is far from satisfactory. As long as prejudice and selfishness exist in human nature, justice will be unknown. Who is responsible for this state of affairs? The Christians, for they compose the great majority of the people, and nearly all the wealth is in their hands. In one word, they rule this country, and Freethinkers are at a fearful disadvantage. But Liberal ideas are spreading in spite of opposition.

I insist that mental freedom alone will lead to the goal. I know the evil of superstition and religious delusions, and when humanity are free from those they are just as free as it is possible to be. Then we can direct our power against other great wrongs that are created by the unjust conditions and circumstances of life. As long as might makes right there will never be justice to downtrodden humanity. The most deserving often fail, while the unworthy often succeed. And yet Christianity proclaims the existence of a God who rules the destiny of men and nations. I believe that fate itself rules our destiny. All must meet their fate, whatever it may be, and all are doomed to one common fate, death, so all are marching on to their eternal fate.

I saw lately in your paper an article from one of your subcribers where he examined the Bible and found no proof of a future life. That's the question to be answered by Christianity. Giv us rational evidence and we will believe. But there is a screw loose in the universe. The horror at Johnstown, Pa., is talked of by the superstitious as God's vengeance on the wicked. I heard it stated, but I laughed at it. I know that nothing can happen on earth without a material cause; and if the visitation of God should come it would be a universal visitation, for wickedness can be found more or less everywhere. This shows what superstition is. He or she who is intelligent and brave, with mental liberty, possesses the greatest fortune on earth. So every man, woman, and child ought to do their best to secure this happy result. Children ought to be raised to think for themselvs, in Colonel Ingersoll's way. Morality is the highest goodness on earth. Let our lives be guided by the law of love, and not by fear of things not seen and that do not exist; learning to be brave enough to meet our fate, whatever it may be; and learning that eternal vigilance is the price of life as well as liberty.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Poetry in Robert Ingersoll's Prose Sayings.

Life is a narrow vale beneath the cold
And barren peaks of two eternities.
We strive in vain to look beyond the hights.
We cry aloud—and the only answer
Is the echo of our wailing cry.
From the voiceless lips of the unreplying dead
There comes no word; but in the night of death
Hope sees a star and listening love can hear
The rustle of a wing.

These myths were born of hopes and fears and tears
And smiles; and they were touched and colored
By all there is of joy and grief between
The rosy dawn of birth and death's sad night.
They clothed even the stars with passion,
And gave to gods the faults and frailties
Of the sons of men. In them the winds
And waves were music, and all the lakes and
Streams and springs—the mountains, woods, and perfumed dells,
Were haunted by a thousand fairy forms.

The Old-fashioned Fourth.

Oh, I hear that there's talking all over the town
Of an old-fashioned Fourth of July.
Such a thing might draw even our forefathers down
From their mansions of rest in the sky.
So much modern nonsense has taken the place
Of the simple old ways and the simple old grace,
That it's good to see signs of a slight change of base,
And an old-fashioned Fourth of July!
Oh, theater bells and church bells all rang out like mad
On an old-fashioned Fourth of July!
And statesman spoke speeches—sometimes pretty bad,
And down South the old "aunties" sold pie;
And the volunteer troops—which were then called militia—
Paraded all day and drank till they were fishy,
And the bands played old tunes—not these washy-wishy—
On the old-fashioned Fourth of July!
And well-loaded anvil went off with a bang
As the forenoon went noiselesly by;
And when evening came on, why, the little sky-rocket
Fizzed straight up in search of a heavenly pocket.
And the fire-cracker rattled and cracked with a shock—it
Played hob with the Fourth of July,
Oh, the old-fashioned Fourth of July
Can't be had without having it high,
When the fireworks blaze you may talk of old days,
But a rocketless Fourth is a lie!

A Bedtime Song.

From the Frederick News.

Sway to and fro in the twilight gray,
This is the ferry for shadowtown:
It always sails at the end of the day
Just as the darkness is closing down.

Rest, little head, on my shoulder so,
A sleepy kiss is the only fare;
Drifting away from the world we go,
Baby and I in the rocking-chair.

See, where the firelogs glow and spark,
Glitter the lights of the shadow land;
The pelting rains on the window, hark!
Are ripples lapping upon its strand.

There where the mirror is glancing dim,
A lake with its shimmering cool and still;
Blossoms are waving above its brim,
Those over there on the window sill.

Rock slow, more slow in the dusky light,
Silently lower the anchor down;
Dear little passenger, say good-night,
We've reached the harbor of Shadowtown.

The Flag of Our Union.

Our beautiful American flag was not always of the same style as at present. From its first appearance until now, it has undergone several important and radical changes. Before the rebellion against British tyranny and intolerance, the colonies reverenced the flag of the mother country, as was just and proper. After they had fully decided to resist the encroachments of England, and to start out "on their own hook," so to speak, they began to think of a flag of their own under which to rally their forces. So they constructed a rough image of a rattlesnake and placed it upon a large square of plain cloth without a bar, star, or cross. This pictured rattlesnake was cut in thirteen pieces, which was emblematical of the number of colonies at that time in the United States. Beneath the snake, in large capital letters, were these words: "Unite or die." Some of the colonies were not favorably impressed with the undertaking to fight old England—hence the imperativ injunction. Later on, however, when they were more in harmony with the idea, the flag was made somewhat larger, and a more perfectly designed rattlesnake was placed upon it with this motto: "Don't tread on me!"

Why did our forefathers select this emblem of a serpent for a national emblem? This question was asked Benjamin Franklin, who gave the following in reply:

"By inquiry and from study I learned that the ancients considered the serpent as an emblem of wisdom, and, in some attitudes, of endless duration. Also that a country is often represented by animals peculiar to that country. The rattlesnake is found only in America. Its eyes are exceedingly bright and without eyelids—emblems of vigilance. It never begins an attack, and it never surrenders—emblem of magnanimity and courage. It never wounds even its enemies till it generously givs them warning not to tread upon it—which is emblematical of the spirit of the people who inhabit its country. It appears apparently weak and defenseless, but its weapons are nevertheless formidable. Its poison is the necessary means for the digestion of its food, but certain destruction to its enemies—showing the power of American resources. Its thirteen rattles, the only part which increases in number, are yet so united that they cannot be disconnected without breaking them to pieces, showing the impossibility of an American republic without a union of states. A single rattle will giv no sound alone, but the ringing of the thirteen together is sufficient to startle the boldest man alive. It has beauty in youth, which increases with age. Its tongue is forked as the lightning, and its abode is among the impenetrable rocks."

This rattlesnake flag did not, however, suit the people altogether, and on June 14th, 1777, the Continental Congress passed a law declaring that the flag of the proposed Free and Independent States should be composed of "thirteen stripes, red and white alternate, and that the union be thirteen white stars on a blue field, representing a new constellation." The idea of the white stars being taken, it is said, from the constellation Lyra, which is significant of peace and harmony. Why was the color of the field blue?

The Covenanters of Scotland carried a blue banner, and blue was the symbol of truth, and the colonies had covenanted together against tyranny and oppression. The stars upon the flag were placed in a circular shape indicativ of endless duration, while the number thirteen (stripes and stars) denoted the number of the colonies, and the mutual dependence and equality. As the blue was emblematic of truth and fidelity, so the red was the symbol of daring and defiance, and white was the signal of purity.

This flag was floated to the breeze first at the battle of Saratoga, Oct. 7, 1777, by the man who afterward became a traitor to the flag he then bore—Benedict Arnold. It is told that when he fled to England after he had betrayed his trust, he carried the original flag and his uniform to that country.

In 1794 the flag was changed to fifteen stripes of either color, and the same number of stars. This was done by an act of Congress, because two new states had been added to the Union. After the war of 1812, six years later, it was again changed to the original thirteen. It had been thought that as a new state should be admitted the fact should be symbolized by another stripe and star. This addition, it was seen, would make the flag a cumbersome affair, hence the idea was very sensibly abandoned, and the flag remains as we see it to-day.

It represents a free country and free institutions. It stands for a free press, free speech, free schools, and free thought. Our forefathers labored to establish the principles of freedom, and left them to be maintained by those who followed them. Everyone should strive to maintain those just and true principles at every cost, and then the glorious old flag will always float o'er "the land of the free and the home of the brave."

How Celluloid Is Made.

While everybody has heard of or seen or used celluloid, only a few know what it is composed of or how it is made. The following is a description of the process carried out in a factory near Paris, for the production of celluloid: A roll of paper is slowly unwound, and at the same time is saturated with a mixture of five parts of sulphuric acid and two parts of nitric acid, which falls upon the paper in a fine spray. This changes the cellulose of the paper into pyroxylin (gun cotton). The excess of the acid having been expelled by pressure, the paper is washed with plenty of water until all traces of acid hav been removed. It is then reduced to a pulp, and passes on to a bleaching trough. Most of the water having been got rid of by means of a strainer, the pulp is mixed with from twenty to forty per cent of its weight in camphor and the mixture thoroughly triturated under millstones. The necessary coloring having been added in the form of powder, a second mixture and grinding follows. The finely divided pulp is then spread out in thin layers on slabs, and from twenty to twenty-five of these layers are placed in a hydraulic press, separated from one another by some sheets of thick blotting paper, and are subjected to a pressure of one hundred and fifty atmospheres, until all traces of moisture hav been got rid of. The matter is then passed between rollers heated to between 140° and 150° Fahrenheit, whence it issues in the form of elastic sheets.—The Inventor.

His Poor Brother.

A boy may be homesick enough to feel badly, and even to cry, and yet not quite homesick enough to lose his self-possession.

Little Bennie was away from home for the first time in his life—away from father, mother, sister, and his twin brother Georgie. He was sleeping alone for the first time, also, and his little heart was heavy.

The room was dark, the house was strange, the mice in the walls made frightful noises. Bennie's soul was filled with apprehension, and after a while he lifted up his voice and wept sorely.

"What is the matter, Bennie?" called his aunt from an adjoining room.

"The matter? Boo-hoo! The matter? I was just a-thinking how Georgie is a-missing of me. Boo-hoo!"

Correspondence.

VICTORIA, TEX., June 7, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write to the Corner. Papa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER four years, and said he would take it if it should cost $5. Victoria has about six thousand inhabitants, and eleven churches—where they try to take care of a person's soul—and not a hospital to take care of his body. I am a member of the Wagner's Silver Cornet Band and play solo alto, and in the string band I play the flute. I will send you the Review to-day.

Yours truly, OTTO HAUSCHILD.

BONHAM, TEX., June 11, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON, Kind Friend: This is our second letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER. We liv four miles north of Bonham. It has been raining all day and farmers are getting behind with their crops. We like to read THE TRUTH SEEKER and Children's Corner, and always read the Corner the first thing. We would like to correspond with some of the children of the Corner. We will close, hoping to see this in print.

We remain your friends,
SARAH WHITE AND ROSA HOLLAND.

MOODY, TEX., June 18, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write a few lines to the Children's Corner. I am ten years old. I hav been going to school, but my school is out now. We hav two heifers, two horses, a cow, calf, and a colt. I hav one brother fourteen years old. My grandpa and grandma are rich. They belong to the church. There are three churches in town. My father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I read a good many of the pieces in it. Hoping to see this in print, I remain,

Your little friend, ALLIE FITOH.

BAVARIA, KAN., June 19, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: We hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER many years. We could hardly do without it. As I am a lover of children, I take great interest in their letters. I think George Remsburg writes noble letters. I hav heard his father lecture twice, and hope to hear him again soon.

Inclosed are a few lines on the death of a neighbor's child, little Lena Hall. If it meets your approbation, please print it, as the grandfather takes THE TRUTH SEEKER.

As this is my first letter to a paper, I will close.

Yours for truth, liberty, and morality,
MRS. O. I. DEAN.

[Our friend will please excuse us for omitting the verses. The sentiment contained in them is good, but the construction is imperfect, and they would read better in prose. Little Lena is safe from all that could hurt or harm. Her little life had its mission, and her sweet memory will be ever precious to those who knew and loved her.—ED. C. C.]

THE STRUGGLE

FOR

Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.
Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

Poetry.

Song of the Ghost-Seer.

Not every man is dead that you meet no more on the street;
Not always the heart is warm when the cheeks with blushes heat;
Not always the kindly meant act is taken well meant and kind;
Not always a face that is fair betokens a gentle mind.

'Tis sad when your friend is dead, or you meet him no more on the street;
Yea! I grieve for the proud hot heart that makes bitter things most sweet;
A face that is fair is good, but better a gentle heart,
'Tis well to know and love them, though bitter the pang to part.

I love not sorrow, I own it, yet many woes filled my cup;
To the lips, ah, me! it was bitter, but it healed when I drank it up;
Friends, mo bhron I made them and lost them, as the bright stars rise and set.
Of friends some lead astray like stars, but I love their memories yet.

And they come still like ghosts in sunlight, the friends of those other years.
Some faces all brightly sunlit, some wet with a rain of tears;
They come and they leave me lonely, they come and they make me glad.
The unbidden guests of my spirit, with greetings grim or sad.

They walk by my side in the city; though you see not, they are nigh,
And I ofttimes pass you unknowing, for the dead hold my mind and eye;
Yes, I fain would love the living, but I must not forget the dead;
They whisper me words of wonder and tales that may not be said.

I liv in the land of phantoms though I walk in the ways of men;
I see in the day and sunlight what the dreamer's eye can ken;
I know what is done in the distance, and I know of deeds to be,
For the poet and seer and dreamer hav met in the heart of me. —Donahoe's Magazine.

Over the Banister.

Over the banister leans a face,
Tender and full of meaning.
I see her still with a dainty grace
Above her banjo leaning,
While by her side I watch her hand
Over the soft notes straying,
Weaving her thoughts as I idly stand
Into the tune she is playing.

The light burns dim in the great square room,
Nobody else is listening;
But through the dusk of the twilight gloom
Somebody's eyes are glistening.
Broken strains of the song are blown
Over her half turned shoulder;
Holding her hand and drawing her down,
Suddenly growing bolder.

The rest is lost in a soft, low note;
What does it mean, I wonder?
But up from the banjo seems to float
The song of the sweet lips' plunder.
The question asked and the sweet caress,
And the Yes that comes from the landing,
What is it, I wonder, that makes me guess
She looks up where I am standing?

What does she mean by the soft, low tune,
And the words that now she is humming?
Why does she start again so soon
The banjo's empty strumming?
Sitting there singing an idle rhyme,
With the soft light o'er her streaming,
Is she but trying to pass the time,
And am I but a fool for my dreaming?

Doc Sifers.

Of all the doctors I could cite you to in this-ere town
Doc Sifers is my favorit, jest take him up and down.
Count in the Bethel neighborhood, and Rollins and Big Bear,
And Sifers's standin's jes' as good as ary doctor's there.

There's old Doc Wick and Glenn and Hall, and Wurgler and McVeigh,
But I'll buck Sifers 'ginst 'em all and down 'em any day.
Most old Wick ever knowed, I s'pose, was whisky! Wurgler—well,
He et morphine—ef actions shows and facts' reliable.

But Sifers—though he ain't no sot, he's got his faults; and yit
When you git Sifers onc't, you've got a doctor, don't fergit!
He ain't much at his office, er his house, er anywhere
You'd natchurly think certain fer to ketch the feller there.

But don't blame Doc: he's got all sorts o' our'ous notions—as
The feller says, his odd-come-shorts—like smart men mostly has.
He'll more'n like be potter'n 'round the blacksmith shop; er in
Some back lot, spadin' up the ground, er gradin' it agin.

Er at the work bench planin' things; er buildin' little traps
To ketch birds; galvenizin' rings; er graftin' plums, perhaps.
Make anything! good as the best—a gunstock er a finte;
He whittled out a set o' chesstmen onc't o' laurel root.
Durin' the Army—got his trade o' surgeon there—I own
To-day a finger ring Doc made out of a Sesesh bone;
An' glued a fiddle onc't for me—jes' all so busted you
'D a throwed the thing away, but he fixed her as good as new.

And take Doc, now, in ager, say, er bites, er rheumatis,
And all afflictions thataway, and he's the best they is.
Er janders, milksick, I don't keer—k-yore anything he tries—
A abscess; getherin' in yer yeer; er granilated eyes.

There was the Widder Daubenspeck they all giv up fer dead;
A blame cowbuncle on her neck and clean out of her head!
First had this doctor, what's-his name, from "Puddlesburg," and then Th's little red head, "Burnin' Shame" they call him—Dr. Glenn.

And they "consulted" on the case and claimed she'd haf to die.
I jes' was joggin' by the place and heerd her dorter cry,
And stops and calls her to the fence; and I-says-I, "Let me Send Sifers—bet you fifteen cents he'll k-yore her!" "Well," says she,
"Light out!" she says. And, lipp-tee-cut! I loped in town, and rid
'Bout two hours more to find him, but I kussed him when I did.
He was down at the gunsmith shop a stuffin' birds. Says he,
"My sulky's broke." Says I, "You hop right on and ride with me!"
I got him there. "Well, Aunty, ten days k-yores you," Sifers said,
"But what's yer idy livin' when yer jes' as good as dead?"
And there's Dave Banks—jes' back from war without a scratch—
Got ketched up in a sickle-bar, a reaper runaway—
His shoulders, arms, and hands and legs jes' sawed in strips! And Jake
Dunn starts fer Sifers—feller begs to shoot him fer God sake.
Doc, 'course, was gone, but he had penned the notice, "At Big Bear—
Be back to-morrow; gone to 'tend the Bee Convention there."

But Jake, he tracked him—rid and rode the whole endurin' night,
And 'bout the time the roosters crowed they both hove into sight.
Doc had to ampitate, but 'greed to save Dave's arms, and swore
He could a-saved his legs ef he'd been there the day before.

Like when his wife's own mother died 'fore Sifers could be found,
And all the neighbers fer and wide a' all jes' chasin' round;
Tel finally—I had to laugh—it's jes' like Doc, you know—
Was learnin' fer to telegraph down at the old deepo.

But all they're faultin' Sifers fer, there's none of em kin say
He's biggoty, er keerless, er not posted anyway;
He ain't built on the common plan of doctors nowadays,
He's jes' a great, big, brainy man—that where the trouble lays! —J. W. Riley.

An Open Letter to Bishop Potter.

BISHOP POTTER, My Dear Sir: Permit me this privilege of addressing you publicly. My theme is your proposed cathedral. I find my justification for thus addressing you in the great importance of the subject to the public, and in the principle involved. I hav had the honor and pleasure of a slight acquaintance with you, and was convinced that in you I had found a man of public spirit, which I am wont to define as one who is great enough and good enough to "care about questions of truth and duty;" in other words to hav at heart the public good, the welfare of one's fellow-man. I had thought, also, that I had detected in you a capacity and disposition to appreciate the great importance of the scientific method and spirit—in short, science—to that end, as a means to that end. I hav also heard you, with interest and profit, publicly discuss and warmly, eloquently, and ably advocate the power, significance, grandeur, and nobility of science in its application for the amelioration of our yet comparativly miserable condition, and for the advancement and exaltation of humanity. And so I had thought of you as one who was abreast with the times, in harmony with the spirit of the age, keeping step with the advance guard of civilization, and whose heart beat in unison with the highest aspirations of the race; in short, who was one of Matthew Arnold's "remnant of society," or of the "ten righteous" necessary that the citadel might not be destroyed, according to the requisition of the Lord, and so for the salvation of society. For I submit that this is the day and age of Science, that is, when mankind, for the first time, and at last, has come, or is coming, fully to realize the importance and necessity of knowledge per se, that is, of the knowing how in order to do the right and to be righteous.

In view then, and in the name, of all that I hav here predicated of the advanced and promising spirit of the age and of its requirements, and of your own sympathy, appreciation, and association therewith, and also of my own desire to be counted (which I hereby acknowledge) as with you and this "remnant" and advance guard, it is that I "rise to object" to the cathedral, and to submit that I am justified in so doing, and that your connection therewith is inexplicable, because such a work is, in the light of this science, etc., I submit, one of retrogression rather than of progression; that it is a going back to the Dark Ages—if not to Egyptian darkness—when, for the want of a higher spirituality and truer conception of real truth, men were wont to place before themselvs these gross and material objects such as could be seen through the "dim religious light" of the times. Such a cathedral would be rank Materialism, therefore, in a double sense.

The master commands that we shall worship "in spirit and in truth," not by brick and mortar. Such an expenditure of money, too, would be sacrilegious rather than religious. This precious wealth—made precious by the sweat and toil and misery of the poor who produce it—according to that master, you but hold in trust for humanity. If he were in your midst think you he would countenance such a use of it, such a diversion, such a waste of it? Would it not be robbing the poor of their rights according to him? "Inasmuch as ye hav done it unto the least of these, my brethren, ye hav done it unto me!" Therefore, my dear Mr. Potter, I would beg of you to desist, for I believe that such a work would be, rather than a public-spirited and meritorious thing to do, a lasting discredit and shame—a monument to folly. It would be the bodying forth of the spirit of pride and pomp, and not the spirit of the meek and lowly master; not his spirit of humility and humanity. Just consider how much good could be done with such a vast amount of money—for instance, in helping to advance the necessary knowledge to effect a scientific organization of industry, and thereby to abolish the present wasteful and soul-harrowing warfare now going on (and promising to increase, with all its terrible consequences) between "capital and labor." Both these alike need this necessary enlightenment. Without it they will go on—as in the French Revolution—like two blind Samsons to tear down the temple to the destruction of themselvs and society with them. Besides, such an ostentatious display of vanity tends to make the distinction of the masses and the classes, and to create such a divergence between classes as to endanger the stability and safety of society itself. Such a divergence of interests, feelings, etc., it is that has brought on the strife and warfare now raging between the "capitalists and laborers." Convergence alone can save us; divergence will surely destroy us. Science givs knowledge, which givs unity of thought and conviction and of interests, and so secures this necessary convergence. The committing of such follies as building cathedrals in this day engenders disunity of thought, feeling, and interests, and so divergence, in which lurks death. Vide the French Revolution. Ah! had the "Estates" then heeded the timely advice and warning proffered them, what horrible scenes and deeds of blood would hav been avoided! So now do I raise my voice of warning, though feeble, "Prepare ye the way of righteousness!" which means truth and justice!

No, my dear Mr. Potter, rather than such a temple of "brick and mortar," dedicated to mammon, let us rear a spiritual temple of "love and wisdom," cemented by mutual human sympathy, and dedicated to truth and duty! This it is that would be more in keeping with the spirit of science—the "spirit of truth" (Christ)—and with the requirements of the age—the wants of humanity. "God is love!" "To this end was I born; for this came I into the world that I might bear witness unto the truth," Christ. God is truth. Truth is God.

Fraternally yours, W. M. BOUCHER.
28 Waverly place, N. Y., May, 1889.

P.S.—Besides all this, such a cathedral would be un-American and undemocratic.

How kind fate was to us that night,
When down the lane moon-veiled in white,
We walked upon the dewy grass,
A blissful twain, with hearts so light,
I think we did not reckon, quite
How kind fate was.

An envious ray sulked in your hair
And paled the gold it could not share;
One lock, loosed from the silvery mass,
Blew half across a cheek so fair,
I proved upon it, then and there,
How kind fate was.

Love duped us, sweet. Last year you wed
Another man, and I, instead
Of muttering oaths in bitter bass,
Sent silver spoons, and as I read
Your bridal cards, devoutly said
How kind fate was! —Time.

"WHAT makes you so thoughtful to-night, George?" asked Nellie. "Well," said George, as he threw his eyes up to the ceiling and took a fresh hold upon her slender waist, "I was thinking that if your mother was willing to become my mother-in-law I would like it very much." "You would?" "I would, indeed." "Then, if it will afford you any satisfaction, I can inform you that I am quite willing that she should, and that she is also quite willing to act in that capacity in a quiet and unostentatious manner." And thus, under the silent stars, the arrangements were concluded by which two lives hitherto running apart are to be blended into one, and a youth hitherto his own master is to stoop under the yoke of a mother-in-law.—Boston Courier.

Gems of Thought.

THE creed which accepts as the foundation of morals, Utility, or the Greatest Happiness Principle, holds that actions are right in proportion as they tend to promote happiness, wrong as they tend to produce the reverse of happiness. . . . In an improving state of the human mind, the influences are constantly on the increase which tend to generate in each individual a feeling of unity with all the rest; which feeling, if perfect, would make him never think of, of desire, any beneficial condition for himself, in the benefits of which they are not included. If we now suppose this feeling of unity to be taught as a religion, and the whole force of education, of institutions, and of opinion, directed, as it once was in the case of religion, to make every person grow up from infancy surrounded on all sides both by the profession and by the practice of it, I think that no one, who can realize this conception, will feel any misgiving about the sufficiency of the ultimate sanction for the Happiness morality.—John Stuart Mill.

CONDUCT is considered by us good or bad, according as its aggregate results, to self or others, or both, are pleasurable or painful. Every other proposed standard of conduct derives its authority from this standard. Even with those who judge of conduct from the religious point of view rather than from the ethical point of view it is the same. Men who seek to propitiate God by inflicting pains on themselvs, or refrain from pleasures to avoid offending him, do so to escape greater ultimate pains or to get greater ultimate pleasures. If by positiv or negativ suffering here, they expected to achieve more suffering hereafter, they would not do as they do. That which they now think duty they would not think duty if it promised eternal misery instead of eternal happiness. So that no school can avoid taking for the ultimate moral aim a desirable state of feeling called by whatever name—gratification, enjoyment, happiness. Pleasure somewhere, at some time, to some being or beings, is an inexpugnable element of the conception.—Herbert Spencer.

IT is allowed that the cause of most actions, good or bad, may be resolved into the love of ourselvs; but the self-love of some men inclines them to please others; and the self-love of others is wholly employed in pleasing themselvs. This makes the great distinction between virtue and vice.—Swift.

MORALITY may be considered to be the current opinion of society as to what course of conduct is most conduciv to the general welfare. It has its origin, not in revelation, but in human experience. —Robert C. Adams in Pioneer Pith.

WE know that acts are good or bad only as they affect the actors, and others. We know that from every good act good consequences flow, and that from every bad act there are only evil results. Every virtuous deed is a star in the moral firmament. There is in the moral world, as in the physical, the absolute and perfect relation of cause and effect. For this reason, the atonement becomes an impossibility. Others may suffer by your crime, but their suffering cannot discharge you; it simply increases your guilt and adds to your burden. For this reason happiness is not a reward—it is a consequence. Suffering is not a punishment—it is a result.—Ingersoll.

I DO not recollect having read in the prolix and argumentativ preacher Bourdaloue, who is the first who has admitted of the appearance of reason in his sermons; I do not recollect, I say, having read a single page against war. The elegant and mild preacher Neassillion in consecrating the colors of the regiment of Catinat, does make, it must be confessed, a few wishes for peace, but he allows of ambition. "This desire," says he, "of seeing your services rewarded, if it be moderate, if it do not carry you into the paths of iniquity in order to obtain your purpose, has nothing in it by which Christian morality can be offended." At last, he entreats God to send the exterminating angel before the regiment of Catinat, "O my God! cause victory and death always to go before them, let their enemies be afflicted with the spirits of terror and giddiness!" I do not know whether victory can go before a regiment, and whether God sends forth the spirits of giddiness; but I am sure the preachers of Austria say as much to the cuirassiers of the emperor, and that the exterminating angel must be at a loss which to attend to. The Jewish preachers went still farther. We are exceedingly edified at the humane prayers with which their psalms are filled. They make no scruple of girding on the divine sword, of ripping up women, and of dashing sucking children against the stones.—Voltaire.

THE cardinal doctrin of a fanatic's creed is that his enemies are enemies of God.—Prof. A. D. White.

No man, worthy of the form he bears, will at the command of church or state solemnly repeat a cre d his reason scorns.—Ingersoll.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 16. No. 28. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY. { New York, Saturday, July 13, 1889. } 28 LAFAYETTE PL. } $3.00 per year.

A FEW PESTS FOR UNCLE SAM TO CONSIDER.

Notes and Clippings.

It is told of a pious, well-meaning man of Kingston that on one occasion, while offering up a prayer in Sunday-school, he referred to the superintendent in this manner: "And, O God! bless the superintendent, who has led such a long, tedious Christian life."

Another form of prohibition has shown up in Joliet, a town of maturity sufficient to hav twelve thousand people. The council there has prohibited billiard tables by a license fee of $5,000 a table, and now the nativs are unhappy and the foreigner cometh not any longer within her walls.

Religious jealousy in India between Hindoos and Mohammedans is said to be fit to involve the entire country in war the moment the British authority should be withdrawn. Lately a Mussulman procession to celebrate a convert was attacked with great fury, and some fatalities were the result.

Some of our German-born citizens object to that part of the report of the special committee of the board of education which calls for a change in the public school curriculum by which the study of German as well as French shall be abolished. But there are reasons for believing that the proposed change will meet with the approval of the board. The other recommendation of the special committee that the manual training course recently introduced as an experiment in some of the public schools shall be adopted in all of them, is warmly supported by our German-American fellow-citizens, who retain the theories which they imbibed in Germany.

The Rev. Dr. Donald, of the church of the Ascension, does not like some of the things he has seen in some of our churches. He says it looks as though these churches were to be "transformed into houses of amusement or clubs of physical comfort, with bowling-alleys, gymnasiums, billiard tables, kitchens, etc."

A call for money to build a new hospital in Jerusalem, issued by the London Society for Promoting Christianity Among the Jews, has roused vehement protest from the Jews. The influence of the hospital, they say, is resorted to for the purposes of conversion, and as a matter of fact the hospital is not needed. The proverbial care of the Hebrews for their own people has not been lacking toward those crowding into Jerusalem. There are already two hospitals, and £9,000 has just been collected in Europe for enlarging them or for building another. Besides that, the Rothschilds hav built a very fine one without the city walls.

The German Anarchists in this city are of the opinion that their number will be increased within a short time. Bismarck is pressing Switzerland to expel those of them who hav taken refuge on her soil, and the pressure is of a kind that is hard to resist. Under its force, Switzerland has recently adopted measures that make their stay within her borders decidedly unpleasant. There is no country on the continent to which they can fly, and those who hav fled to England find life there too hard for them. Their eyes are now turned toward America, and their brethren here are looking for some fresh company this year.

Says the Washington Post: "We regard it as our duty to censure the Albany Argus for intimating that Col. Elliott F. Shepard is "laboring under temporary aberration of the mind." He is doing nothing of the kind. In the first place, it is no more labor for Colonel Shepard to act that way than it is for a red-headed man to wear red hair, and in the next place there is nothing whatever to justify belief that it is temporary."

The synod of Catholic archbishops and bishops of the kingdom of Bavaria hav drawn up and presented to the royal government a kind of ultimatum embodying the following demands, to which they claim that the church is entitled under the terms of the concordat of 1818. In the first place, they insist that all government supervision of the religious and doctrinal instruction in educational institutions should at once cease; second, that the simultanschule, or schools for children of non-Catholic parents, in which all doctrinal instruction is avoided, should be immediately abolished; third, that Freemasons and "enemies of Christianism," ergo heretics, should be legally disqualified and debarred from teaching in any public or private schools, colleges, or universities; fourth, that all normal and primary schools in the kingdom and all public libraries should be subjected to the absolute and exclusiv control of the clergy; fifth, that the supervision and control of all doctrinal and theological instruction in the national universities be confided to the Catholic episcopacy; sixth, that the government refuse any longer its official recognition of the sect known as "old Catholics," and lastly, that the internal administration of the church in Bavaria, as well as its teachings and doctrins, be entirely freed from all further interference, supervision, and control on the part of the government.

Among the various propositions that are pending before the people of Washington territory for incorporation as a part of the constitutional provisions of the new state, is the following, which we take from a report in the Herald: "1. An absolutely secret ballot. 2. No appointiv power to be vested in state officials—all public servants to be elected, 3. Minority representation. 4. Submission of a proposed law to popular vote by a one-third vote of the legislature. 5. Enabling municipal governments to own and control industries. 6. Taxation of land held from use as high as land used. 7. Reservation of tide and school lands for benefit of state and school funds. 8. No private detectiv agencies to be allowed. 9. No infringement upon the right of the people to peaceably assemble together for discussion. 10. Annual sessions of the legislature. 11. An expeditious method of amending the constitution so as to conform to changing conditions." Baptism.

"Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the father, and of the son, and of the Holy Ghost." "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved."[1] It is on these two passages principally that the sacrament[2] of baptism of the Christian church is founded, and its introduction or at least the sanction of the same attributed to Christ Jesus himself.[3] It is, however, certain—in spite of the words in the two first-quoted passages—that Christ Jesus himself never directly commanded his disciples to baptize the heathen.[4] Paul, the apostle to the heathen, says that, with a few exceptions, he did not baptize. The ancient Christian custom in initiating new members consisted in prayer and laying on of hands, proceedings which were kept up until the time of Stephen, when controversies arose between the advocates of the "ancient Christian custom and those who favored the still more ancient but pagan custom of baptism."[5] It was at a comparativly late date that the form of "the father and the son and the Holy Ghost" was used. Its first introduction into the Christian system of theology is due to Justin Martyr (about A.D. 150), who ascribes his knowledge of this divine mystery to special inspiration. The passage in John v, 7, "For there are three that bear record in heaven, the father, the word, and the Holy Ghost, and these three are one," is now generally admitted to be an interpolation; it is not mentioned by the early ante-Nicene fathers nor in ancient versions, but was first quoted at the conference of Carthage A.D. 254,[6] made a dogma by the council of Nice, and subsequently enforced by civil power by the emperors Constantine and Theodosius, the latter of whom by expelling the clergy of Arian tendencies, and by at least fifteen severe edicts and military force, succeeded in establishing as part of Christianity the dogma as professed in the Athanasian creed.[7] Before this time the form was different. Pope Nicholas I. and Cyprian both acknowledged the legality of baptism "in the name of the Lord Jesus."[8]

The question now naturally arises, from whom did John the Baptist receive the rite of baptism? He may hav received it from the Jews, who since their captivity at Babylon used to wash or baptize proselytes prior to their admission in their church, or perhaps—since John and Christ Jesus, according to the writer's opinion, were both Essenes—from either Egyptian or Buddhist sources. Both the ancient Egyptians as well as Hindoos, whether Buddhists or Brahmans, were acquainted with the rite of baptism. Immersion in the Egyptian water of purification,[9] sprinkling or immersion by Buddhist or Brahman priest in "holy water,"[10] produced the same result as immersion by a Christian bishop, the candidate arose from the water born anew, a regenerated, sinless being.

The ancient form of the baptism idea was that, as the candidate's body was in baptism cleansed by the use of water and rubbing, so his soul did by the same ceremony attain a purity, a clearness, it had not previously known. But since the baptism ceremony could take place only once, it was by many persons put off until the hour of possible approaching death. Therefore in case of war or pestilence the number of baptism aspirants always increased. The most notable person who delayed his baptism was the imperial murderer, the first Christian emperor Constantine the Great, the father to the Christian Sunday. He was first immersed in the "blood of Christ"[11] shortly before his death, when the ceremony was performed by Eusebius of Nicomedia.

While during the apostolic ages, and for some centuries after, the scene of the baptismal ceremony was sometimes a spring or well, or a large reservoir or bath, or perhaps a river, the third century witnessed the introduction of special buildings, so-called baptistries (from the Greek baptisterion, a large basin or vase), of which there generally was but one in each city, and which was either octagonal, as the baptistry of St. Giovanni in Fonte, or circular, like that at Pisa, which is about one hundred and sixteen feet in diameter.

[11] During the third and fourth century it was almost universally believed that the baptismal water was changed into the blood of Christ Jesus.

The baptism ceremony in those days being widely different from any now in use by any Christian sect, I beg the reader to follow me to the baptistry at Pisa on the day of the decollation of John the Baptist,[1] and at a time shortly after its erection in the third century. After ascending the three steps on which the building is raised we enter the baptistry itself—which externally is divided into three stories, the lower two surrounded by columns—and passing through the outer chamber, we, by means of a stairway, enter the galleries that run round nearly the whole inside of the building.[2] Outdoors everything is dark; then it is near midnight; and inside the building only a solitary lamp throws its rays, giving to the surroundings a mysterious, indefinit character tending to inspire awe in the mind of the beholder. The light increases. Single and in groups the converts arrive, each carrying a lighted torch. The last straggler has arrived. The rites of exorcism take place among the sounds of music and prayer; and while the devil beats an ignominious retreat the whole company divests itself of every stitch of clothing, except the shirt. Now, turning toward the west, they stretch out their hand and in chorus address the satanic majesty thus: "I renounce thee, Satan, and all thy works, and all thy pomp and all thy service." Next, turning around, facing the east, they recite what now constitutes the Apostles' creed, or the Nicene creed, that is, the belief in the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. The recitation is over. Forming a double file they march into the inner chamber, where the baptismal reservoir is, and, after they are stripped of their last garment, the deacon or deaconess proceeds to anoint them with oil from head to foot.[3] After anointing they stand up in front of the bishop, who puts to each several questions pertaining to the confession of faith, Christian life, etc. The immersion, which used to be three times,[4] corresponding to the persons in the trinity, is over; the sign of the cross is made on the forehead of the new "soldier of Christ;" he is anointed anew; the bishop breathes upon him, to signify the expulsion of the devil; a little salt is put in his mouth, a sign of love for heavenly things, such as is proper for a true Christian. Next his ears and nostrils are touched with a spittle, indicating that as in the future his nasal organs should be perceptible to the odor of virtue and truth, just so the ears should be closed to falsehood but ever open to truth. Milk and honey is given to him as a token of his (the candidate's) ability to receive spiritual graces and gifts, and at last the chrysome, or white gown, is thrown over his shoulders as a sign of innocence of soul and the kindly feeling of the new brotherhood. The ceremony is over, and by reciting the Lord's prayer the new-born Christian expresses his faith.[5]

While the chrysome and the anointing were retained for a long time after the Reformation in the Church of England, these, as well as the other abovementioned ceremonies, except the sign of the cross, hav now entirely disappeared from all Protestant churches. In the Roman Catholic church only the anointing remains, but in a quantity of a few drops only. And the sacrament of baptism can now be administered even in private houses at any time during the year, and can be performed by any clergyman—yes, and as in the Roman Catholic church, even by laymen and women.

The word baptism, which means dipping in, immersion in water, is derived from the Greek and Latin, baptisma—Greek, baptiza, I dip, submerge, and bapto, I dip, immerse—this word naturally indicates a plunging into water. This was also the practice of early Christians, and is yet continued in Eastern churches, while in those of the West it is found only among Roman Catholics in the instance of the baptistry of the cathedral at Milan and among orthodox Baptists. In the beginning of the thirteenth century opposition arose, and slowly (Elizabeth and Edward VI. were both immersed) but surely the rite of "sprinkling" was substituted, and since the seventeenth century it has acquired a solid hold in the northern and western states of Europe. And we hav here a strange, yet, to a student of theology, familiar fact: the church's disregard of custom and belief, no matter by whom sanctioned, as soon as the popular voice imperativly demands it.

The baptism by immersion is, according to the Christian theologians, sanctioned by Christ Jesus, his apostles, and by usage of early churches, and yet now it is an exception and not a rule.

Another change we must mention is the introduction of infant baptism. Already at an early period in the history of the church we find it, but, as Neander says,[1] "although it had been set forth as an apostolic institution, its introduction into the church was slow." It is first spoken of by Irenæus, was opposed by Tertullian at the end of the second century, while it is in the third, when defended by Cyprian and acknowledged as an apostolic institution in the Syro-Persian, Alexandrian, and North African churches, that we hav the first recorded case of infant baptism.

The chief reason for the introduction of infant baptism was, no doubt, the growing belief in the necessity of baptism to salvation, since if the Augustinian doctrin of original sin was true, an unbaptized individual would necessarily be lost. Still, in spite of the anathematizing—chiefly through the influence of St. Augustine—of the belief expressed by the fifth council at Carthage, that among the "many mansions" there might be found an obscure corner for unbaptized children, the belief in infant damnation was never officially sanctioned by the church of Rome, and John Calvin's church is the only one that has stained the leaves of its Confession with the inhuman and cruel doctrin of infant damnation.[1]

The custom of infant baptism, like that of adult, was found centuries before the appearance of Christianity. It existed in ancient Rome and Greece.

"Poor wretch! do you not see that since these sprinklings cannot repair your grammatical errors, they cannot repair either the faults of your life?" says Diogenes.[3] It was familiar to the Danes, Norwegians, Swedes, and Icelanders, who, according to the "Hava-mal," and other epic poems, poured water on the head of the child, and gave it a name.[4] The ancient Druids,[5] Levonians, and Germans[6] practiced it; yes, even in ancient Mexico, Yucatan,[7] and Peru[8] we find the same.

That the use of the sign of the cross on the forehead of the baptized person should be confined to Christians would be more than strange, inasmuch as the figure of the cross is found as a religious symbol in both Europe, Asia, Africa, and America. "Mithra signed his soldiers in the forehead," says Tertullian.[9] The Buddhists likewise made the sign of the cross on the head of their followers.[10]

But why enumerate more examples? The two above-quoted instances are sufficient to prove the antiquity of the rite, and I will therefore proceed and examin an institution connected closely with that of baptism, viz., that of sponsors.

For centuries it was the parents that answered for the children, and with the exception of the Montanists in Africa, among whom sponsors were introduced at an early date, it was comparativly late in time that this institution was recognized by the different sects. Even to-day it is rejected by Presbyterians and independent churches in general, on the ground that the profession of faith given by one or both of the parents entitles the child to baptism. But whether the profession is given by the parents or by sponsors does not in the least degree affect the absurdity of the ceremony. How can one person answer for the conduct of another over whom he or she can, even under the most favorable environments and circumstances, hav but a limited influence? And according to common justice and every-day good sense the baptized individual cannot, in case of nonfulfilment of vows given by another person unauthorized by him, be morally responsible.

The giving of a name at the baptismal ceremony is, as we might hav expected, not a Christian custom. In fact, as long as infant baptism did not exist, there was no use for it, but as soon as introduced, the "giving of name" was added to the already "Christianized" baptismal ceremony. To prove whence the early Christians procured this "heathenish" custom is very difficult, if not impossible, but we know it was in use among the Greeks and Romans, Etruscans and Egyptians, Brahmans and Buddhists, etc.

The so-called sacrament of confirmation was at first connected with that of baptism, but since the fourteenth century we find it postponed until later, a custom which is now in general use in all Western churches, while that of the East yet immerses, communicates, and confirms the children on the same occasion.

That the clergy of the "religion of love" should in their unbounded mercy try and succeed in stretching the words, the "whole world," so as to include even dead persons and inanimate things, is not more

[1] For centuries baptism was administered only twice a year, on the day of decollation and on that of the nativity.

[2] These galleries were, even far down in the Middle Ages, occupied by the nobility, who stood here to witness the ceremony.

[3] Although we hav no good evidence that the two sexes were baptized apart, the writer is inclined to believe that such was the case at least during the Middle Ages. The anointing with oil signified the gift of the Holy Ghost, and was a custom common to all nations of antiquity.

[4] A parallel to this triple immersion we hav in the Roman baptism with fire, where the candidate jumped three times through the sacred fire.

than one might hav expected, knowing the zeal and fervor wherewith they hav gathered and do gather converts to faith. In former days baptism by the wholesale was no uncommon thing, as is proved by the conduct of St. Francis Xavier, and that of the bishops under the reign of Charlemagne during the latter's crusades against the Saxons. The innumerable cruelties which stain every page in the history of the Christian church—and which were necessitated by the instinctiv aversion to the religion of eternal damnation of almost every honest and inquiring mind—we find no more. Social ostracism, bribery, and kidnapping are now the levers by which the church sustains herself.

While we in the ancient Egyptian belief in baptism after death hav a parallel in the current Christian belief in the salvation of the holy men and women of the Old Testament and of such heathen as were "affected" by Jesus's three days' revival meeting in hell, I hav in vain sought in other religions for a resemblance to the Roman Catholic church's baptism of bells. In such occasion exorcism is used; the bell is sprinkled with holy water, rubbed with oil of catechumens, a formula of consecration, in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost is read, and a name is given it in the presence of sponsors. That these divine ceremonies are passed through with some rational object in view, and not simply for imposing upon the ignorant masses, as a "small" Infidel friend of mine believes, is distinctly avowed in these words used on such occasion: "To turn off storms and tempests from the faithful."

In Matt. iii, 11, we find the following: "I, indeed, baptize you with water; . . . he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire." And in verse 16 we are told of the "Spirit of God" (Holy Ghost) descending like a dove; while in Acts ii, 2–4, we are informed of the baptism of the twelve apostles with cloven tongues of fire and with the Holy Ghost.

The passages above quoted are unquestionably interpolations, since at the time the gospels are said to hav been written a belief in a trinity in unity was entertained by the Christians, and it is, as we hav seen, doubtful whether the rite of baptism was in use at that time. The writers of the gospel of Matthew and of Acts no doubt derived their knowledge of baptism with fire from the Essenes, hence from India, where even to-day it is a custom in said country for mothers to pass through the sacred fire with their children in their arms.[1] Still, the rite is by no means confined to the Hindoos; the ancient Romans,[2] Danes, Irish, Jews, etc., performed it, and relics of it may yet be found in Ireland, Scotland, and in the Catholic institution of purgatory.

In the baptism with the Holy Ghost we hav evidently another remnant of paganism; then among the ancients a bird, generally a dove, was the symbol of the third person in their respectiv trinities. Signifying incubation, it united in itself the two principles.

Before closing this essay it will not be without interest to inquire into the possible origin of the universal, ancient belief in the efficiency of water to produce a regeneration. The idea conveyed by the word regeneration imports the existence of a former, an original state of sinfulness of the person to be regenerated, and it is therefore only natural that we, in nations believing in a "new birth," find an anterior belief in original sin. "I commit sin, my nature is sinful, I am conceived in sin," says the Hindoo in one of his prayers.[3]

But why the regenerativ power of water? It was among the ancients a current belief that all beings, animal as well as vegetable, owed their origin to the two productiv powers of the universe—to the male and female principles, to fire and water.[4] Still, it was supposed that they, when separated, lost their productivness, hence the two elements were generally combined, symbolized, directly or indirectly, in the persons of superior deities. Hence we hav in the person of Bacchus, of Atys, of Neptune, Adonai, etc., a general emanation of the productiv powers, the coöperation of which was necessary to produce the regeneration. In course of time the original meaning was lost. Popular fancy and the imaginations of poets caused a mass of myths and stories to cluster around the primitiv conception. The gods changed their characters, and a belief in the regenerativ powers of the water as apart from the deity became prevalent.

Usury.

THE CHRISTIAN AND THE AGNOSTIC VIEW.

President White in his "Warfare of Religion and Science," and R. G. Ingersoll in his "Mistakes of Moses," or some similar production, hav instanced the usury laws as illustrativ of the pernicious influence of religious intermeddling with economic subjects. I refer to this to bring into contrast the two views indicated above.

The Christian, following the Mosaic law, for ages treated usury as "a sin," denouncing and punishing it as such, although at the same time enforcing the collection of debts, in the spirit of the law of pagan Rome, which accorded the creditor the power of life and death over the debtor. The scientists, on the other hand, hav looked upon interest simply as one of the economic forces. And in no field does the triumph of science over religion seem more complete than here. A single century since the days of Jeremy Bentham, has sufficed to work a complete change in all Protestant states, they now wholly repudiating the Jewish and Christian theory of usury; and the Catholic church, by the adoption of a childish casuistry, has attempted to reconcile its present lenity toward a "heinous sin" with the ancient superstition, in order to keep up with the progress of modern thought.

The point raised recently by Professor Cook, and the attitude of many advanced thinkers to-day, suggest the removal of the whole subject from the field of moral and religious and even of civil sanction, and of subjecting it to a closer analysis than either Christian or Agnostic has yet given it.

If Bentham's reasoning is sound as to the impolicy of prohibiting usury, it would seem naturally to follow that neither should the civil law interfere to enforce its collection, or indeed any debts at all not involving fraud or betrayal of trust. A careful analysis will make plain the fact that, ordinarily, interest is made up of several distinct integers, only one of which appears obvious to the unscientific mind, viz, payment for the use of money. In addition to this, however, there is in every case a risk to the lender, unless the debt be fully secured. Also, there is the personal tax, and time and trouble for which an equitable compensation is due. In addition to all this there is what may be termed an economic interest, an increased production arising from the joining of conserved labor (money, or things which money will purchase) with present or current labor, over that which present labor alone could effect, and in cases where it would enable a party to get his product earlier to market. But this would also hav its inverse contingency. Not always the first, sometimes the last in market gets the higher price, so that economic interest becomes both a plus and a minus quantity, and with the price of commodities, under the law of supply and demand, yields alternately a profit and a loss. To prohibit interest, or to fix a rate by law, is therefore as stupid, as usury advocates often remind us, as to fix by law a price to labor or to merchandise, as was often done in the past centuries.

But interest, as practically existing, arises mainly not from the operation of economic law, but as a result of positiv interference therewith, a fact which, if scientists hav recognized it at all, they hav carefully concealed. Economic interest, under freedom of production and exchange, would necessarily vibrate from the mean or zero to the plus or minus side, as does the pendulum of a clock, or as the waves rise and fall, alternately, above and below the general level of the sea.

The interest with which we are acquainted is sustained by monopolies, under class law, as a constant plus quantity, as if the water in an effluent wave could hold itself forever in that position, without being followed by a depression below the point of rest, in its effort to attain equilibrium. There appears then the broadest of all possible distinctions between the interest growing out of the operation of economic law and that which springs from positiv monopolies. The first is not only a variable, but an undulating force; the last is a positiv quantity, begotten and upheld by positiv institution. The scientists, therefore, who hav clamored for the repeal of the usury laws, stultify themselvs in failing to ask for the repeal also of those laws now barring the action of the economic law, which ever tends to bring the interest rate to zero from either side, by whatever cause disturbed. For interest created by law will cease on disuse of the law. And while the law is in use its results are proper subjects of legislativ regulation.

The point raised by Mr. Ingersoll, whether it is better to use capital in a way to obtain the highest rate of interest from it, is quite aside from the true issue. It is only the duty of the legislator to inquire what the economic and social laws are, and to guard against interference with them either by pious zealots or unscrupulous rings. Otherwise he becomes a party either to bigoted intolerance or to grasping avarice. That customary interest is mainly monopolistic appears from the fact that it is identical in character with the rack-rent of land; is associated with monopoly of credit enjoyed under our laws of banking and legal tender, privilege to corporations, patent rights, protectiv tariffs, and with all operations where the tendency of the economic law is suspended to enable favorits to reap constant profits and escape alternating losses, which in consequence fall necessarily upon labor, ultimately, in addition to its own proper share.

In monopolistic rent lies the prime basis of all monopolistic interest or profits. The theory of economic rent, first formulated by Ricardo, bases it upon the superior fertility of some soils over others, and upon choice of location. It did not occur to him that rent, as known to our laws, had grown up from wholly different causes and conditions; from the farming out of the royal taxes to favorits, who were often allowed to appropriate them wholly to their own use, and at last to assume ownership of the lands upon which they were levied, making tenants, serfs, and vassals of the occupants. From this, as the commercial spirit superseded the feudal, was born the forced, competitiv, or rack rent of our times. Especially, he did not discover that true economic rent, aside from repairs and necessary expenses, was a vibratory quantity, and, whether as to fertility of soil or advantage of location, was constantly subject to change from the plus to minus side. Fertil soil becomes exhausted, and excessiv products beget a local glut; new uses bring demand for differing quality of soil; changes in business, in fashion, in governmental policy, in war, and numerous other circumstances, change the estimated value of locations from the greater to the lesser, and from the lesser to the greater. Prospectiv values of location are vastly uncertain. The "loss and gain" to these values on the whole equal each other. But for monopoly of ownership of the land this would be most apparent. That shuts out opportunity to the many and destroys free competition. It should be evident to the stupidest economist that law-created rent and law-created interest are wholly different from such rent and interest as exist from the operation of pure economic law. Although unfortunately associated in the common mind, and indeed heretofore in their scientific classification, as one and the same thing, economic rent, interest, and profit hav no more resemblance or relation to the monopolistic things bearing those names than hav the most desirable and salutary exchanges of commerce to the plunder of the freebooter; and to make this illustration complete, it should mean such freebooter as once had legal charter and protection from the state.

It will now be seen not only why the Agnostic should decry the existence of the usury laws, the arbitrary and violent interference with the business of the people, and the full operation of the law of supply and demand, but also why he should demand the removal of all those laws which now bar opportunity, legalize privilege, block the wheels of human industry, and obstruct the free exchange of services and products. The philanthropist has, on the other hand, sought through barbaric enforcement of law to remedy the results to privilege which flow from private dominion of land, the monopoly of credit, legal tender laws, bank charters, and limitation of coinage. But he also stupidly fails to demand the abolition of these privileges. It is unnecessary to call in question the humanity of the scientist or the sincerity of the Christian. Each one sees a side of the complex subject, but neither comprehends its exact nature, and each makes the same error in regarding usury as a result of economic forces. The one wants it suppressed by law, whereas it only exists by law. The other wants it given freedom, whereas the freedom of industry and commerce would destroy it as a positiv factor in business, leaving only that undulating quantity which results from the tendency of supply and demand and from the growth and decay of nature's production. Mr. Ingersoll is mistaken in supposing that loaning money at interest is essential in comprehensiv enterprises, as in railroad bonds, etc. The healthful investment of capital follows economic law, not legal enactments. Moneyed men will just as readily invest their means to avoid loss as to make gains. In the absence of subsidies and class privileges the tendency will be to place it where it will become most serviceable to the general interest, in opening new avenues to industry and in exploring new fields of enterprise, and which usually giv better returns than the old and beaten lines of business.

The monopoly of the land, which is the primal foundation of a tribute, now rendering our citizens a mass of hirelings and serfs, is not in the line of public policy or the general welfare. The monopoly of money and of credit is equally dangerous to public prosperity. The modern progress in material improvement we owe to science, not to usury-bearing debts, protectiv tariffs, or subsidies to adventurers. It has been obtained despite of these. While, therefore, the moral and religious aspect of the controversy must be relegated to the limbo of medieval shades, the true economic bearing of the question becomes one of the first importance, and suggests to Christian and Agnostic alike careful study and exact analysis, rather than obsequious bowing to ancient religious myths, or to the absurd fictions and musty statutes of barbaric times and of unscientific thought. While people will submit to laws which foster extortion they should not complain. The advocate of religious toleration will benefit mankind but little by delivering them from religious fanaticism and superstition, while inculcating submission to forms and maxims of law derived from ages of despotism and barbaric rule.

The usance of land, money, or goods (rent, interest, or profits), which grows from the operation of arbitrary and unequal laws, is directly the opposit of economical increase under the reciprocal exchanges of commerce. The denunciations of Moses, St. Chrysostom, of Ruskin and Palmer, are wholly justified when confined to the former. The eulogies of White, Ingersoll, and economists generally are merited when applied exclusivly to the latter. To eliminate the first no repressiv or cruel law is needed —only the repeal of those which grant unjust and unequal privilege. To thus abolish monopolistic rent, usury, and profits, would be to giv their economic synonyms their full force and play, and secure the healthful and salutary influence they are able to exert in every department of social industry—use of the best lands and prosecution of the most serviceable work.

No writer on political economy of note that I am aware has distinguished between the theoretic rent of Ricardo and "the price of monopoly," which Mr. George defines rent practically to be. The free traders, indeed, show how manufacturer's profits are increased by tariffs, but do not trace interest to the operation of protectiv laws, or show how monopolies change the vibratory motions of purely economic forces into constant quantities of tribute to privilege at the expense of labor always. If this view be not, as I think, mainly novel, it is a formulation original with me, whether a valuable contribution to the subject or otherwise. J. K. INGALLS.

Our "Roll of Honor" for the current month is looming up grandly. Secularism, unlike the unfortunate Irishman, is neither "dead nor speechless."

Even in the darkest and most beclouded hour, one's vision is gladdened by bursts of sunlight, dispelling the gloom, illuminating the onward path, and infusing fresh courage and hope into the almost despondent souls of those who love our cause and work for its promotion. Every contribution serves a twofold purpose—the funds are for the propaganda, and at the same time the spirit evinced by the donor encourages those who are bearing the "burden and heat of the day" to persevere in their "work of faith and labor of love," and acts as an incentiv to fresh exertion upon many who need such visitations to "whet their almost blunted purpose."

Our hearty thanks are due to Brother J. O. Bentley, of Philadelphia, who has responded so nobly and promptly to our appeal for help. We know that he neither desires nor expects thanks, as he is one of those rare spirits who love

To do good by stealth
And blush to find it fame.

Nevertheless he will hav to undergo the "blushing" ordeal this time, for we desire by means of publishing this munificent donation, from one who is a comparativly (so far as I know) recent acquisition to our ranks, to remind many of our older veterans that their laurels are in danger, and stir up, by way of remembrance, many minds which seem to sadly require a little of that process. Secularists must bear in mind that our cause, good and grand as it is, is not self-supporting. "A Paul may plant and an Apollo water," but it is cold, hard cash which must furnish "the increase." We hear a great deal about silver-tongued orators, but the most effectiv silver-tongued oration that the Union can make use of is the silver dollar, or its representativ, and Brother Bentley having sent one hundred of these eloquent advocates we proudly emblazon his name at the head of our "Roll of Honor," and extend to him the heartfelt greetings of all our friends and co-workers.

Brother L. Geiger celebrated the day on which the Bruno monument was unveiled by sending $20 in to the Campaign Fund of the treasury. Geiger is so great-hearted and generous that I am almost ashamed to accept any more for the Union from him. His donations within two years to my knowledge hav run into hundreds of dollars, nor has he wearied of well-doing. He is inclined to the belief that there are lots of "Liberal" misers who ought to "get fits." Brother Geiger's hand is ever open to such appeals, and it is never an empty hand either. His continued contributions to the cause show that Leonard Geiger is determined to make up to the Union in generosity the loss it sustained in the death of Courtlandt Palmer. He is determined that he will dispose of what he can for the good of the cause during his lifetime, and not leave it for others to pervert and fight about. No worthier example could be followed.

A very interesting communication is at hand from Marius Heighton, of Kent, O., Secular Union, inclosing their subscription, $15. The amount is gratefully acknowledged, and we regret that so earnest a worker is so environed by the unpleasant contrast of men who from motivs of expediency donate most liberally to orthodox enterprises of various kinds, but who can spare nothing with which to fight superstition, or enlighten and elevate humanity. A Freethinker should be a free giver. Thoughts alone are powerless to emancipate the race from the curse of ecclesiastical thralldom and sacerdotal supremacy. The exponent of thought is action, and the watchword for all Secularists at this time is,

Men of thought and men of action,
Clear the way!

We are pleased to receive a communication from Vice-President H. P. Mason, of Salt Lake City. The sacrifices he is making to sustain our work in his locality are appreciated. One sentence in his letter furnishes the key to the situation almost everywhere. He says, "There are but three or four persons here that giv any considerable aid to the Liberal cause. This makes it hang heavy on us." We can all take up the burden of this refrain; the lukewarmness, indifference, reluctance, etc., of even professed and outspoken Secularists to sustain the cause and support the work make it "hang heavy on us." When will our Secular friends shake off their fatal lethargy and show by their earnest, persistent efforts that they "mean business;" that they hav enlisted for life and are determined to giv freely of time, money, and energy until throughout this broad land they hav succeeded in establishing "the flag above the cross," or, as Browning expressed it, liv to see

Saint, savage, sage,
Fuse their respectiv creeds in one,

and let that creed be

The world is our country,
To do good our religion?

One of the most cheering and encouraging messages recently received is from our old friend and stanch ally, Almond Owen, of Milwaukee. Hear him: "A life-member of the American Secular Union, I cannot expect to be much longer a living one, for I hav entered my eighty-fifth year. While I do remain, however, it is my wish to be doing a little for the promotion of the objects of the Union." That is the kind of talk we like to hear. What a stinging rebuke to the indifferentists is administered by this sturdy old veteran in the above expression! Eighty-five years old, but still anxious to help, still eager to serve and work. Our friend has more than exceeded the allotted period, yet we hope he may liv to celebrate his centennial birthday. He is one of those whom the poet had in mind when he exclaimed,

E'en in our ashes liv their wonted fires;

for often in the fires of age still glow warm and bright souls of enthusiasm and devotion. We salute our venerable friend and assure him that though he may not remain with us many more years, yet we shall cherish his memory, revere his character, and imitate his example. His will be among Secularists

One of the few, the immortal names
That were not born to die.

Thanks, Brother McCabe, for the words of sympathy and encouragement contained in your missiv. While the officers of the American Secular Union strive to discharge their duty under any and all circumstances, whether their efforts are appreciated or not, they by no means object to testimonials of this nature, which assure them they are not alone in the unequal struggle. Human sympathy is always grateful, words of cheer ever welcome. J. J. McCabe delivered a most stirring, vivifying, electrifying centennial oration, eliciting a letter of approval from the historian, Jas. Parton. The oration was published in the Investigator, and is invaluable for historical date and originality of treatment.

Having been urging Brother McCabe on the question of organization, we are confronted with the same condition. How long will Freethinkers supinely submit to be a reproach to Freethought? The ability and inclination to help are so seldom found in company that it is a pleasure to hear from so persistent a worker and helper as J. J. McCabe. It will be through his efforts if anyone's that Albany will be redeemed from Secular indifference.

However, we hav a few Liberals who, "being dead, yet speak." We hav even a message from a "Coffin," and it is a good, cheering message, too. Would that we had a few more such lively corpses—they would create consternation and havoc in the ranks of orthodoxy. All success to our worthy co-laborer of Longmont, Col. We trust that many happy years may elapse ere this particular Coffin shall be consigned to its usual destination. He may rest assured, however, that when this common fate shall hav overtaken him, the Secularists of Longmont will see that "his grave is kept green."

To C. C. Richardson, Omro, Wis., and Fred Schamhorst, of Stella, W. T., we extend thanks and fraternal greetings, assuring them that their favors are duly appreciated. No one can do better than his best, and if all did as much, Secularism would receive a boom and orthodoxy hang its "diminishing head."

To one and all our thanks!

EXCELSIOR.

Last year we were all proud of the recognition received by Miss Bertha Piper, our accomplished pianist, who won the bronze medal at her school for an essay on "Patriotism." We are now doubly rejoiced at the merited distinction she has further gained for herself and the cause by achieving triple honors at the head of the graduating class of the Oakley school. Colonel Sexton, the new postmaster of Chicago, took particular pleasure in presenting the daughter of his old-time friend not only her graduating diploma but the Foster diploma as well, and in addition to that the Lawson silver medal for her essay on "Patriotism." If the school-house had been put up for competition Miss Bertha would surely hav carried it off. In addition to the regular course, Miss Piper also took lessons in German, music, and drawing. In music her progress is prodigious, and in that art alone she could doubtless win distinction. A good many friends were present at the exercises, and she was the recipient of a couple of handsome bouquets. Our talented young friend will store her mind preparatory to devoting herself to "learning the young idea how to shoot," and after that she will study medicin and surgery. She bears the stamp of genius. E. A. STEVENS, Sec. A. S. U.

A Plea for Our President's Proposition.

[The following letter so ably, so forcibly, and so intelligently covers the whole question that, for the edification of your readers, I send it for their perusal, with my most emphatic indorsement.—E. A. STEVENS.]

FRIEND STEVENS: I hav noted with great pleasure the fact that the proposition to prepare a manual of Secular morality to be introduced into the public schools is everywhere received with the approval and commendation it so justly merits.

The commonly accepted idea that a sound system of ethics and morality must be established upon a theological basis can be, in my opinion, successfully controverted only by the publication of such a work as Secularists propose. Some one has said that the best way to meet an argument is by a fact, and the mere announcement that the ethical manual, or manual of morality, or whatever it is to be called, is un fait accompli, cannot but silence, even if it does not convince, skeptics and opponents.

The truth is that theology and ethics are not even distantly co-related. Theology is a purely speculativ matter, and in accepting its authority an individual is simply required to assent to certain dogmatic assumptions which are not susceptible of demonstration. These dogmas principally relate to the existence of a God, the nature and destiny of the human soul, and similar abstractions, all of which may be implicitly accepted by the most depraved wretch that ever drew breath, or utterly rejected, as unworthy of credence, by a man of the purest life and most unblemished character.

As the apostle James very forcibly puts it, "Thou believest that there is one God—thou doest well; the devils also believe and tremble."

Admitting, for the sake of argument, that such imaginary beings as devils hav a veritable existence, it is by no means improbable that they are divided into orthodox and heterodox, and most probably the former are inclined, on the strength of their orthodoxy, to regard their skeptical brethren as many degrees lower in the scale of Mephistophelian depravity than themselvs.

And so, a man may be a superior theologian, perfectly versed in the inscrutable mysteries of ecclesiastical dialectics, and yet his standard of morality be of an exceedingly low order. The theologian no more than the mathematician is necessarily a moral man. A man's intellectual conceptions hav absolutely no relation to his character. Therefore it is absurd and inconsistent to insist that a system of morals must hav a theological basis.

A child may be taught to revere the good, abhor the evil, despise the base and mean, and admire and emulate all that is noble and grand in humanity without even hearing the word God. He may be shown the beauty and power of a noble life; instructed as to his duties as a citizen, inspired with a sense of justice, imbued with principles of integrity, and all this without the question ever being raised as to whether he will hav a personal existence after death.

I would go even further than this, and take what I believe to be still higher ground, viz., that the question of morality not only need not be associated with theological abstractions—I assert boldly that it should not be. I hold that morality loses by the association—that it is actually degraded by it. The very moment that you tell a child that he should be good because the "all-seeing eye of Jehovah" is ever upon him, noting his every action, prepared to offer him a premium upon right conduct and to inflict severe chastisement for the commission of unworthy deeds, that very moment you destroy the morality of the child's acts and make them a matter of policy; and policy is a thing which has no moral significance whatever. In my judgment no more immoral maxim was ever penned than "Honesty is the best policy." In this sentiment the significance of honesty as a moral quality is destroyed and a commercial value substituted therefor. The lesson inculcated is not, "Be honest because it is right, because it is your duty, but because, in the long run, you will be the gainer by it, and the loser by being dishonest." The same sentiment is expressed in the scriptures in this manner: "The righteous hav the promis of the life that now is as well as of that which is to come." Christians, of all others, should hesitate before attacking utilitarianism, as their entire theology is founded upon a utilitarian basis, and appeals to the lowest motivs by which human conduct may be actuated.

It is not assumed in the foregoing that any perfect system of morality has ever yet been, or in the nature of things ever can be, formulated. The aim of a moral teacher should be not to lay down any cast-iron rules of morality, but to awaken and quicken moral perceptions. Since the human race began, mankind has recognized a difference between the abstract principles of right and wrong; humanity, in all ages, is unanimous upon the point that there is a vast distinction between them. But in defining what acts are good or bad per se an infinit variety of opinion has been obtained; the sentiment in this regard of the people of one age or one race being utterly antagonized and oft-times deliberately reversed by another. True, the consensus of public opinion has ever delighted in expressing itself in such glittering generalities as, Be honest, be chaste, be just, be true, etc., and ad infinitum, but to the queries, What is honesty? what is chastity? what is justice? what is truth? probably no two human beings hav ever returned the same answers. What then? Shall we say that morality is a myth—a mere sound devoid of significance? Far from it. Duty is a real, a positiv thing. The eternal ought weighs down upon each human soul, demanding therefrom implicit obedience. Woe betide that soul that refuses to render it! But the specific duties devolving upon individuals are as diverse as the individuals themselvs, and the task for each human soul is to ascertain what his or her duties may be and to be governed accordingly. The work of the moral teacher, then, is simply to enable the learner to ascertain these duties—to assist him in the discovery of moral truths and in the adaptation of them to his or her individual requirements. What is needed in the realm of morality is not more light, but a stronger, clearer moral vision, whereby we may be enabled to perceive and analyze correctly the rays of the light we now hav, to the end that they may illumin our souls' deepest recesses, and show clearly the way our feet must go. "For if the light that is in us be darkness, how great is that darkness."

With best wishes for the success of the contemplated movement, I remain, dear sir,

Yours fraternally, S. WOODMAN.

Mrs. Freeman's Travels.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Saturday and Sunday, June 15th and 16th, I gave three lectures in Atlanta, Ill. This is a lovely little town situated on the Chicago & Alton railroad. The people are wide awake, intelligent, and progressiv. The lecture on Saturday evening was well attended. A number of orthodox were present, among them a Methodist minister. Notwithstanding the extreme heat, quite a number came out Sunday afternoon. In the evening a reverend gentleman felt the necessity of getting up a counter attraction by speaking on the Johnstown flood. This did not prevent the Freethinkers securing an audience of three hundred or more. The Liberals were well pleased with the attendance, and pronounced the lectures a success. I was met at Atlanta by a bevy of Liberal stalwarts from "away back." I was entertained by Dr. Gardner and his pleasant family, being driven to his home by his beautiful daughter, who kindly took me in the carriage to and from the lectures. The doctor is an old resident, a friend of D. M. Bennett, and has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER ever since its first publication in the little town of Paris in this state. He is a noted physician, and has managed, through a terrific and holy church boycott, to secure a handsome competency. He has a family of which he may well be proud, lovely daughters and honored sons. I had the pleasure of meeting three of this younger generation—the young doctor in business in Atlanta, and two daughters. The doctor's wife, Mrs. Gardner, is a liberal Methodist, distinguished and dignified, presiding with grace at her hospitable home. The doctor himself is an evolution from her church. His fall from grace was due to reading the Bible in order to gather knowledge to destroy Universalism. Before he had mastered the scientific facts of the first chapter of Genesis his faith was shattered. Reason has since held the fort.

James Tuttle, one of the noted Freethinkers of the state, a life member of the American Secular Union, took me in his carriage to his lovely country home. Here I met his wife and niece, his daughter and her husband, Mr. Richmond. Mr. Richmond is an evoluted Unitarian, Liberal and learned, and some time I am going to Atlanta on purpose to finish our talk. There were some little points about God and religion that we did not agree on. We could not quite decide where Pantheism began and Monism left off, and vice versa—at least, I couldn't. However, the subject will last, and be just as fresh a thousand years from now as it was a thousand years back. No need of hurrying. We had a real old-fashioned country dinner. I mention it because it was a novelty. The long table set on the porch, green trees, green grass, roses—roses everywhere. How much Putnam could hav made of that dinner! How his poetic soul would hav bubbled over with glowing words at the memory of the delicious biscuit and golden butter! What music he would hav drawn from the great bell which called the men to the meal!

Mr. Tuttle is eighty-five or eighty-six years old, his wife eighty, and I must say that they are a handsome couple, bright and wide-awake, and looking so young that I couldn't realize they had lived so many years. Mrs. Tuttle's hair is as brown as a girl's, and the delicately outlined face fair and sweet. "She grows handsomer every day," said her husband admiringly, whereat she gently administered a smiling reproof. I remember this home every day, and there is a reason for it—I was invited to stay a week. Invited to stay a week among the roses! Who wouldn't pleasantly recall people extending an invitation like that?

Several Liberals came from Lincoln, eight miles distant, to attend the lectures—Hon. R. A. Talcott, J. F. Sisson and wife, Dr. A. Crichfield, known to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER by occasional contributions as "John Bushel," and a very pleasant gentleman with whom I took dinner at Mr. Tuttle's, but whose name I hav unfortunately forgotten. Dr. Crichfield is an earnest Liberal, well posted, wide awake, and full of enthusiasm for the cause. It was due to his activity, I believe, that I was invited to visit Atlanta.

Wilford Hall Explained.

IN THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 29th Lemuel J. Potts, or rather his authority, Wilford Hall, propounds certain conundrums to the believers in Darwin's theory. He wants to know why they are still looking for missing links. I will inform him that they are not. It is only people who do not understand the theory who demand the production of these links. The theory teaches that it is the nature of selection to eliminate them, and that we cannot expect to find them except accidentally, as we occasionally see a monster. He says that, according to the Darwinian theory, no lower animals ought to exist. This is a sublime specimen of Hall's blunders. The theory is that natural selection adapts every animal to its surroundings by weeding out the individuals not fitted to survive under the circumstances—the "missing links," so-called—as Potts or Hall has just borne witness that it does. The existing "lower" animals are just as well adapted to their environment as the "higher" to theirs. A clam is adapted to liv under water, a man is not.

> Say not that man's imperfect, heaven at fault;
> Say, rather, man's as perfect as he ought.

If the incapacity of hybrids to multiply proves anything, it proves that species were specially created and not intended to propagate together; and it would be an argument of some power for that object if the phenomena of hybridity in various degrees of prolificity did not exist. But, as Mr. Potts disbelieves in special creation, I need not press this further than to remark that his expressions about reversion to the primitiv type are not very clear. The law of cross-breeding, so far as established, is that the simplest breeds are the most persistent. Thus, an attempt to improve the simple breed of French sheep was a failure so long as they were crossed directly with English mixed breeds. But, by a double cross, the object was attained. The French sheep were crossed with another simple breed, and their offspring, crossed with the English, assumed English qualities.

Mr. Potts, or Mr. Hall, appears to think it a crushing argument against natural selection that this process cannot create useful peculiarities but only perpetuate them. Incipient wings, for example, would not, he says, be useful. The answer is that incipient wings are useful. The wing of the flying squirrel is incipient compared with the bat's; but it is useful. Under circumstances adapted to test the flying qualities of the squirrel to the utmost, he might become the progenitor of animals which would fly like bats.

Wilford Hall attempted to demolish not only Darwin but the scientists in general, and triumphantly succeeded in proving that he did not understand them. The following is a specimen of his reasoning: The intensity of light is said to vary inversely as the square of the distance (from the center). Therefore, at four feet, it is only one-sixteenth what it is at one foot. By parity of reasoning, says Hall, it ought at eight feet to be one-sixteenth what it is at four feet. But at eight feet it is one-fourth what it is at four feet. Behold a demonstrated absurdity! Hall is the champion ignoramus of the century. As I said in your paper when his book first appeared, he is crazier than Jo Cook, for he has thrown himself right into the remorseless clutches of mathematics, which Jo in his maddest, merriest moods was sane enough to keep away from. Talking of Darwin, I wish my friend "Zeno" would read him. It might giv him some new ideas about his favorit author, Ma'thus. C. L. JAMES.

The Old Puzzle.

Mr. Palmer, in THE TRUTH SEEKER for June 15th, has addressed to me a letter, with which I agree in the main. I hold with him that Christianity is derived from Buddhism, and also that the first five books of the New Testament contain very little history. I am inclined, however, to admit the probability that, among the many thousand Jews who bore the name of Jesus or Joshua about twenty centuries ago, there was a martyr for his opinions, some of which were preserved, with his name, in the religion founded by Paul. Four of the epistles ascribed to this apostle, namely those to the Romans, Corinthians, and Galatians, appear to me, as they hav done to many of the boldest and most learned critics, for instance DeWette, to be genuin. The arguments for this opinion hav been often printed, and may, I think, be found in the last edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica, and also in Renan's books on the apostles. I am not able to go to a library at present, but I know that there is plenty of evidence of the authenticity of these four epistles. To me, they prove a historic basis for the gospel myth. Still, all such questions hav become very difficult, in consequence of the wholesale destruction of books by the early Christians. We hav no right to speak as confidently about Jesus as we can about Cicero and Socrates; and there is certainly no excuse for any but the most good-natured kind of controversy about the New Testament narrativ.

I hav not read "Supernatural Religion," but hope to be able in a few months to compare it with other books, as well as to see how far Paul was a Gnostic. My present opinion is that he was less heterodox than Marcion, who did, I suppose, differ so widely from the majority of the bishops as to be fairly called a heretic. But I ought not to write any more from memory on such knotty questions.

Annisquam, Mass. F. M. HOLLAND.

Lectures and Meetings.

MRS. FREEMAN is intending to make a lecture tour through Dakota and Minnesota in September and October. Those desiring lectures in these states, or on or near the route that reaches them, will please communicate with her. Also those wishing lectures near Chicago. Address Mrs. M. A. Freeman, 402 W. Madison street, Chicago, Ill.

W. F. JAMIESON will take a lecture tour eastward, commencing with the Union Pacific railway from Denver, Col., through Kansas into Missouri. Here will be a good chance for Liberals all along the line from Wallace to Kansas City to avail themselvs of Jamieson's lectures. Hays City, Russell, Ellsworth, Salina, Solomon, Abiline, Chapman, Junction City, Manhattan, Topeka, Lawrence, Leavenworth, Burlingame, Carbondale, will be visited if desired. Address, W. F. Jamieson, Coryell, Col.

A Fool and His Folly.

The Rev. W. R. Taylor, pastor of the Presbyterian church of Rochester, N. Y., preached a sermon recently on Sabbath desecration. The following is a passage from the sermon: "Now with regard to the Sunday newspaper—flung on your doorsteps before you are up; placed before your breakfast plate; with its news gathered assiduously; with the latest local developments; with market quotations and its editorials on burning secular questions. The world dominates a man six days of the week, and he should break away on the seventh and say that 'on this day I shall be free.' But the newspaper comes and asserts the world's dominion. It must be read immediately—before divine service. If it does not totally unfit a man for divine service it consumes valuable time which might be spent in study. If you are a spiritual man stop your Sunday newspaper. Think of the men whom it keeps from church. Then there are those who are not satisfied with one paper, but who come home from the news-stand with both hands full. In behalf of good order, then, I ask you to stop your Sunday paper. The same reason which should prevent you from reading a Sunday paper should keep you from ever advertising your business in a Sunday paper."

A new city ordinance in Kansas City prohibits the keeping open of any place of business, or selling or exposing for sale on Sunday, after 10 o'clock A.M., any goods, wares, or merchandise, other than drugs, medicins, or other articles of immediate necessity.

The Inconsistencies of Christianity.

The system of doctrins which Christians claim was taught by Christ is supposed by them to include all morality. And were Christianity of divine origin, such an assumption would be correct. But as Christianity does not include all morals it is positiv evidence that Christianity is not of divine origin, and therefore it must be of human origin.

Many persons mistake morality for Christianity—that is, they think they are one and the same. Christianity is a system of doctrins thought to hav been taught by Christ, and may include much that is moral.

But morals do not include Christianity; if so, they would be interchangeable terms.

Were Christianity of divine origin, and did it contain a code of morals which was perfect, there would be perfect harmony and consistency in all of the statements of its doctrins as well as in the system itself.

We cannot expect a system of dogmas purporting to emanate from a divine source to conflict with itself in sentiment, or fall short of accomplishing its purpose.

Some of the principal tenets which compose the system of Christianity are the doctrins of the trinity, the fall of man, the immaculate conception and birth of Christ, the vicarious atonement, the regeneration and redemption of man, justification by faith in Christ, the crucifixion, death, and resurrection of Christ, the general and final judgment of man, his acquittal and reward of heaven or condemnation and consignment to eternal punishment.

No constitution or system of theology, coming from whatever source, is adequate to meet the demands for which it was designed, unless its statements confirm and strengthen each other. Each should within itself be a proposition taken together with every other statement to solve the problem and serve the purpose for which the whole was designed.

Take the doctrin of the trinity—three persons in the godhead.

The statement is absurd and untruthful that it takes three to make one, and that one makes three. Christianity talks of an eternal sonship—of making Jesus Christ, the only begotten son of the father, as old as his father. The father is represented as being in the highest heaven, and as having been seen by no man at any time, while we are told that Mary the mother of Jesus is with child by the Holy Ghost (in Matt. i, 18), the second person in the trinity; making out two fathers for this son who claims an eternal existence and sonship. An official work is assigned to each person of the trinity, and the immaculate conception of Mary the mother of Jesus is ascribed to the Holy Ghost or Holy Spirit, whom Jesus never recognizes as his father but calls the comforter, while he always calls the God in heaven his father and teaches his disciples to say: "Our father which art in heaven."

The untruthfulness and absurdity of this doctrin of the trinity is enough to overthrow the whole system of Christianity. Nor does the contradictory absurdity stop until an eternal self-existing God begets himself and then murders himself, which was all purposed, planned, and foreordained from before the foundation of the world; because the plan of salvation was according to the foreknowledge and foreordination of God the father.

Since Mary the mother of Jesus was a natural woman and belonged to the Adamic fallen race and must hav imparted to her child Jesus her fallen nature, it would be illogical to assume that Jesus was equal with the father by reason of his inheriting a fallen nature from his mother; therefore he was only half God or there was a violation or a suspension of the laws of procreation, which would be an exception to all fixed law and to every other birth which ever occurred in the human family. And if he was only a half God and belonged to the fallen Adamic race, he was not a fit subject to redeem a fallen world by offering himself as a propitiation for sin; for how could one having a fallen nature redeem a fallen world? If anyone thinks I am making false and absurd statements, I refer you to the scriptures, which Christianity says were all given by inspiration of God and are profitable for doctrin, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, and are an infallible rule for faith and practice. It is claimed that they were written by men divinely inspired and are a perfect treasure of heavenly instruction, that they hav God for their author, salvation for their end, and truth without any mixture of error for their matter. Which, apparently, to my mind, is the crowning, overwhelming, diabolical absurdity and falsehood which overshadows all the stupendous plan of Christianity.

The foreknowledge and foreordination of God the father is a matter of such great importance in reference to the plan of salvation and the theory of Christianity, I must refer you to passages of scripture to substantiate the fact. 1 Pet. i, 20, speaks of Christ with his precious blood as of a lamb without blemish and without spot, "Who verily was foreordained before the foundation of the world." Rom. iii, 25: "Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past through the forbearance of God." The apostle Peter in Acts ii, 24, says of Christ: "Him being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, ye hav taken and by wicked hands hav crucified and slain." 1 Pet. i, 2, in speaking of different Christians to whom he was writing, says: "Elect according to the foreknowledge of God the father through sanctification of the spirit unto obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ: grace unto you and peace be multiplied." These are the passages of scripture from which the eight articles in the Westminster Confession of Faith upon the subject of foreknowledge and foreordination were formulated—and which in themselvs are contradictory.

Now, scripturally God is an omniscient, omnipotent being, who predetermins all the affairs of the universe. If he foreordains he must hav foreknowledge, and then it necessarily holds that he must be omnipotent to execute his plans and purposes. And if this is true who can thwart his purposes?

According to such statements and logical reasoning man is not a free moral agent, and is fated according to the foreknowledge and the predetermined purpose of God. If man is not a free moral agent why hold him responsible for his not believing in Christ unto salvation?

And why did an all-wise God devise such a great plan of salvation and expend so much energy, blood, and agony in its execution? God the father secreted in the highest heavens devises the plan of salvation. God the son, who was with him before the world was, and God the Holy Spirit, are the principal executors of this plan of salvation. Now, the first thing which is requisit is to hav something to be saved and something to be lost, and all must be created according to his foreknowledge and predetermined purpose. The son of God, Jesus Christ, before he was born of the Virgin Mary, the same was in the beginning with God. "All things were made by him; and without him was not anything made that was made. The word became flesh and dwelt among us." So says the first chapter of John's gospel. The six days' work was now all complete—sun, moon, stars, beasts of the field, Adam and Eve, and God saw that it was good. The serpent, which was more subtle than any beast of the field which God had made, was ready to execute his work in reference to this plan of salvation which had been predetermined by the God of heaven, for man must fall in order to be lost and in order to be saved. And it must all be accomplished to glorify our father which art in heaven! "In the day thou eatest thou shalt surely die." Now, if man did die, what kind of a death did he die? Evidently, it was the same kind of a death which God the father predetermined God the son should die to redeem man, as God the son was to suffer and die on the cross as a substitute for fallen man.

If Jesus became a substitute in death for us it must be the same kind of a death which God predicted for Adam. It could not hav been a physical death, since physical death is the common lot of mankind irrespectiv of the death of Christ on the cross. Hence it must hav been a spiritual death which was predicted for Adam and his posterity. And if Christ were a substitute for Adam in a spiritual death, and Christ is one person of the trinity, and three make one, as a consequence the universe was without a God a part of three days when Christ died on the cross. If Adam did die in the day he ate of the forbidden fruit, how could Christ be a substitute for a death which had taken place?

But Christianity tells us that death in the case of Adam meant that Adam was stricken with death which never ended. If that were true the death substituted by Christ should hav been eternal, never to end. The instantaneous death which Christ suffered on the cross could not hav been equivalent to an eternal death in the wailing torments of hell. Surely if man was to be redeemed by Christ dying in his stead, and the death predicted for Adam was an eternal death, then Christ should hav died eternally, and would to-day be suffering the torments of hell instead of being exalted at the right hand of the father in heaven making intercession for his saints.

The fall of man and the redemption of man through faith in a crucified and risen Christ are the most important tenets in the scheme of Christianity. The fall occurs four thousand years before the crucifixion. Now, if the crucifixion must necessarily follow the fall of man in order to redeem him, and one is a counterpart of the other, and both are in accordance with the foreknowledge and foreordination of God before the foundation of the world, where is the necessity of placing them four thousand years apart? Why not hav the crucifixion of Christ as the means of redemption take place soon after the fall?

Then again, the general resurrection and a general judgment is yet to take place, no one knows how soon or how long off. It may be ten thousand years in the future before we are summoned to attend the general tribunal. There is a lapse of time, of thousands of years, which expires before the complete accomplishment of the redemption of one soul. And yet Christianity tells us when the Christian dies he goes directly to heaven, and that when the unbeliever dies he goes directly to hell; after which away down in the future, no person knows when, not even the angels in heaven, none except the father which is in heaven, at the general judgment all shall appear, the righteous and the unrighteous. Then every knee shall bow and every tongue shall confess all the deeds done in the body. And the righteous shall hear the blessed acquittal: "Come ye blessed of my father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from before the foundation of the world." And the unrighteous shall hear the sentence: "Depart ye cursed into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels." There would seem at least an impropriety or an inconsistency, after they had been in heaven or hell, to call them back here to a general judgment, and then send them either up or down the second time.

If the law of evolution is an immutable law we might conjecture it, too, had to do with the plan of salvation.

And when we come to study the character of Christ as he is portrayed to us from the creation of the world down through the Old Testament scriptures to his immaculate conception, birth, crucifixion on the cross, resurrection, and ascension into heaven revealed to us in the New Testament scriptures, who will say God the father did not foreordain evolution and include it as a means in the plan of salvation? Let us keep before our minds that God is a triune being; that the same Jesus Christ, born of Mary, a fallen woman, is the God of the Old Testament who created all things and pronounced them good, even the serpent who was used as the means to execute the fall. In Gen. vi, 6, God is said to hav repented that he made man. And in Ex. xxxii, 14: "And the Lord repented of the evil he thought to do unto his people." Let us remember this same Christ of the New Testament is the God of the Old Testament, and we must study his character as one and the same being—the same being at the creation of the world that he was when he died on the cross. Let us notice his character and his doings in the Old Testament—how he and his people were the aggressors and instigators in carrying on war; in murdering thousands of innocent, helpless women and little children; in lying, thieving, and sending all manner of plagues on the people; in flooding a world to destroy it; in destroying the work of his own hands which he had pronounced good—how he instituted and upheld human slavery, tolerated polygamy, concubinage, and upheld the Jewish people in all manner of wickedness. And then come on down into the New Testament scriptures to a meek and lowly Jesus going about healing all manner of sicknesses, speaking as no man spake, with no guile found in his mouth, and we must conclude that the law of evolution enters into the system of Christianity, and has to do with the very God of the Bible.

Christianity alleges that God, by his eternal purpose and will, foreordained all the means included in the execution of this plan of salvation. Therefore, all the types and symbols spoken of in the Old Testament scriptures, such as Abraham the father of the faithful; Abraham having two sons, one born of the bondwoman to represent the fallen Adamic race in the bondage of sin, the other born of the free woman to represent the free man in Christ Jesus, "For in Adam all die, so in Christ all are made alive;" the children of Israel delivered from Egyptian bondage and journeying in the wilderness forty years to the land of Canaan, representing the Christian pilgrimage from earth to heaven; all the sacrifices of cattle, sheep, and doves, by which many thousands of innocent brutes were often slain for a burnt offering at one time, as well as the paschal lamb of the Jewish passover—were all to represent and symbolize Jesus the lamb of God slain from before the foundation of the world.

Indeed, all the history of the Old Testament scriptures, including the fall of man, the Jewish theocracy, the patriarchs, the priests, judges, prophets, their taking the land of Canaan, with all their aggressiv wars, all their tabernacle services, rites, and ceremonies, including the prophecies down to the birth of Christ by Mary, were only the shadow of coming events—only a prelude to Christianity. Even as "Jonah was in the whale's belly three days and nights, so shall Jesus be three days and nights in the heart of the earth."

Christianity says that after the literally dead body of Jesus had lain in the grave a part of three days and nights he came forth, was seen by five hundred at one time, ate before them, and was caught up between the clouds and ascended into heaven, and ever liveth at the right hand of God the father to make intercession for his saints. Here again we hav another violation or suspension of a fixed law in nature—the law of decomposition. For as soon as there is a dissolution between body and spirit the processes of decomposition take place. All are included as a means foreordained to the accomplishment and completion of the scheme of Christianity and the plan of salvation. And whatever wickedness may be included in the means, even the prostitution and murder of God himself, are justified by the end.

Jesus, born in Bethlehem of Judea, matures from babyhood to a lad of twelve years, is found in the temple teaching wise men and doctors; after which he serves a time as a carpenter. But it would seem his mechanical genius rather deteriorated—having fashioned and framed the worlds, made beautiful woman from a man's rib, fashioned Noah's ark and Solomon's magnificent temple, he now works as a common carpenter.

He is set apart to his public ministry by the baptism of John, and then undergoes a fast of forty days in the wilderness, and the angels minister to him, and is now accosted by his satanic majesty, the same old serpent that executed the fall, who had evoluted into the form of a man or he could not hav ascended the pinnacle of the temple. He had got rid of the curse and no longer went crawling on his belly, eating dust.

Now hear Jesus in his public ministry declaring his beautiful beatitudes. He no longer says, an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth, as he had said through the Mosaic law. He has evoluted so far as to say, "Resist not evil;" so far that he says he had come to fulfill the law, the Ten Commandments which he had given Moses on the Mount. Hear his tender words of love and peace as he went about doing good. He is no longer the God of war. He no longer kills innocent women and children, but he takes the little children in his arms and blesses them and says, "Of such is the kingdom of heaven."

He is now the friend of women, allowing them to eat the crumbs that fall from the master's table, for even the dogs do likewise; to anoint his feet and wipe them with the hairs of the head. He only calls men fools, a generation of vipers, whited sepulchers full of dead men's bones. He only takes a scourge of small cords and drives them out of the temple.

He only pronounces woes against Pharisees, scribes, hypocrits, lawyers, and a few cities, and threatens them with destruction because of their unbelief in him. He only breaks up family relations, and sets relativs at variance with each other, a man against his father, and a daughter against her mother, and a daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law. He only makes a man's foes those of his own household. Notwithstanding he tells his disciples to sell their garments and buy a sword, when Peter draws his sword and smites off a man's ear he tells Peter to put up his sword. Ah, evolution is manifest in the character of the son of God! And if such is a fact, which I think we hav demonstrated as we hav followed his character out of the Old Testament scriptures into the New, he is not and cannot be infinit. God, as infinity, includes entireness, a completion of perfection in character. An infinit God could not evolute; and certainly, if not infinit, God must be finite—a human being.

Divine justice is to be appeased on the part of a fallen world. And though Judas and the Roman soldiers execute the deed, it was foreordained, as was the fall of man and the vicarious atonement of Christ. The innocent one who had evoluted down into the peaceful days of the gospel is to suffer the penalty of death for the disobedience of the world's first parents four thousand years before. Where is the relation between Adam's disobedience and the death of Christ four thousand years after?

I fail to see it in the foreknowledge or foreordination of God or anywhere else, since the law of cause and effect is an immutable law and has stood the test of ages, and pertains to everything in the universe of worlds, to all matter animate or inanimate, and has to do with all the great relations of the planetary systems of the universe, as well as all the minutest relations of the smallest atoms that float in the sunbeam, and likewise enters into the most intricate relations, actions, responsibilities, and existence of every human being.

Produce the cause, however small, and you get the inevitable effect. There is no escaping the effect of the cause. Violate any law of your mental, spiritual, or physical being, and the effect follows. Put your hand into the fire—the effect admonishes you never to repeat it. Would God foreordain, purpose, and execute the plan of our ruin, and then make us responsible for acquiescing in the plan, and inflict the penalty on an innocent party? Such a transaction would be a perversion of the law of cause and effect as well as the law of justice.

The sacredness of life forbids the innocent to die for the guilty. He who suffers martyrdom for a religious faith or any other cherished principle violates the highest law of his being, and makes a greater sacrifice than he could possibly make in sacrificing the dearest principle of his life.

Such a proceeding is an impeachment of divine justice and a disgraceful reflection upon every attribute of a deity. To devise and plan according to his foreknowledge his own death would be the most atrocious crime in all the catalog of crimes on the part of any human being, much more on the part of a God.

Christianity, crouched and imbedded in all the absurd, illogical dogmas of her superstition, eulogizes her God and Christ for every virtue and moral excellence that has ever been made manifest in the practical life and history of all mankind. She falters and fails to reason concerning her dogmatic system of theology, but decorates her decaying remains with the living flowers of truth and virtue which hav an inherent existence and spontaneous growth in the hearts and consciences of every human intelligence. Sermons are preached, books are written, to attribute all the good found in mankind to a divine source, coming through the efficacious blood of a crucified savior.

And by reason of their faith in him they receive a divine impartation of his life, of his virtues, and every moral excellency and quality of soul, and really fancy that every noble aspiration which inspires men to noble deeds and a life of benevolence and purity comes from the influence of Christianity either directly or indirectly, forgetting the unparalleled wickedness of Christian influence, its widespread example by Christ the God of the Old Testament scriptures and his allies for four thousand years; forgetting all the bloody, heinous deeds and horrible deaths committed by the Inquisition of the twelfth century; forgetting that Christianity has slain a million witches; that she has given rise to and been the cause of more war than any other one thing, and drenched the world with the blood of our ancestors.

However much good may be attributed to her example and influence, if there were a truth in the atonement of Christ, his blood could never atone for all the wicked influence and black crime which will haunt her history down into the last memories of future ages.

Christianity has failed to prove man's condition a fallen, lost one. And if it were a fallen, lost condition, it fails to offer a perfect, exemplary man or God as a means of redemption. And had the system been perfected in a complete execution, it is illogical and opposed to every feature of man's highest and most progressiv nature and interests, in that it weakens and stifles his moral and spiritual susceptibilities for higher attainments in moral worth and spiritual graces. The beasts of the field and the fowls of the air teach us a more logical and sublime way.

The lion of the forest starves her young to incite them to go out and seek their own prey and thereby grow strong. The soaring eagle that builds on the stony mountain cliff throws her young out into the airy space below to force them to use their pinions and grow strong. Shall man, who has greater possibilities in moral excellences and attainments, in all that is grand, sublime, and good, lie dormant and inactiv and recline his head on the bosom of an atoning savior—trust in his merits for divine acceptance?

The scheme of Christianity assumes to deprive you of all self-reliance, of all the dignity of your manhood, to let you sink down into the lowest depths of despair and death itself, and then to take you up in her own strength upon her own merits into the highest heaven, and claim all the glory for herself and her God; for such is her philosophy, to humiliate man to the lowest position in order to exalt him to the highest.

Better foster and cherish all the inherent germs of our own spiritual and moral nature, and flap our own pinions of love and benevolence and soar above the dark clouds of remorse and depression of soul and all the weaknesses of erring human nature, above religious dogmas and superstition, and lift our heads above the surging waves of human life, reaching down with one hand to help those below us, while we reach up to those above us for aid, ever watching for the mariner's light on the eternal shores of fairer climes; maintaining the increasing strength and dignity of our own manhood; resting assured that truth and right, emanating and reflecting from the vast procession of human intelligences which hav gone before, shall beckon us onward to a more perfect life.

Iscariotism in the Modern Church.

Standing by the St. Peter's of Rome, and seeing its tall spire, or rather dome, pointing away up into the blue sky, towering in loftiness above any other human structure on the earth, except the grand pyramid, the idea struck us, "Why call it St. Peter's?" Then followed the recollection that other church buildings were named in honor of St. Paul, St. Matthew, St. Luke, St. John, or other disciples, apostles, or martyrs, until the name of Judas Iscariot is reached, where they stop.

The character of Judas is dismissed with very few words in holy writ, and those few do not present him in a light that inclines church people to name their structures in his honor. The infamous act of betrayal of his savior attracts such condemnation from religious people that other qualities are overlooked. While the other saints hav the churches named after them, there are more followers in the footsteps of Iscariot than of the other eleven, and these followers are in the churches named after the other saints.

Commentators do not say much about Judas. No extended history of his life is given by any writer. Nothing more seems to be said of him than apparently is necessary to fill out the complete history of other transactions. And yet Judas must hav been a pretty good sort of a man in some respects, else the Lord would not hav chosen him one of his disciples. It is even hinted by one of the sacred writers that the devil took possession of Judas at the time he betrayed the Lord, thus leaving room for the belief that he was a good man at other times, and possibly overtaken with a kind of temporary insanity at that moment. During the period of Christ's ministry upon earth Judas was intrusted with the funds—that is, he was the treasurer. He not only took care of what money belonged to the disciples, but there is strong suspicion, judging from a transaction in Bethany, that he was interested in getting finances into the treasury. Some commentators say that Judas was a real estate agent, and had his eye on a corner lot in Jerusalem, and that it was his intense desire to possess this that made him act so despicably.

This can hardly be possible, because property in the city was on a boom, and the amount was insufficient to even clinch an option, if it ranked as Denison property does. We are rather inclined to the belief that Judas was so intent in keeping the treasury in funds that he gradually lost sight of the mission of the Lord as a savior. And when the situation is canvassed it will be seen that he must hav had a hard time. Recollect, there were no oysters in those days, at least not in Judea. If Judas had had just one poor, little, half-starved oyster to hold a supper with, and then published in the evening paper what a grand success his oyster supper was, he would hav had no difficulty in raising funds.

We do not even know that the grab-bag had yet been invented. Lotteries were in vogue, yet we hav no information that they were yet applied to the raising of the minister's salary, or that he ever sold chances in a cake with a ring in it. If a trade carnival was indulged in for the support of the synagog, no mention was made of it. The Capernaum News is silent about any broom brigade giving an exhibition for the benefit of the Sunday-school. The Galilee Journal is mum about the ice-cream festival held to put a new carpet in the church. The Nain Echo says nothing about a railroad excursion to the sea for the purpose of paying off the debt on the church. Nor was it the custom in those days to throw in a chromo with every act of worship. Judas had not caught on to the thousand and one ways of working the racket that modern times hav devised; so he must hav had a trying time in dull seasons to keep the treasury in funds.

Does it require a stretch of the imagination to understand the possibility of insanity under such afflicting circumstances?

We suspect that he was the inventor of voting cheap cakes to the most popular young lady, always being careful to select the girls of two rich dudes and charging good fees for the votes. We also hav reason to believe that he worked the racket of "Rebecca at the Well," peddling circus lemonade for more than it was worth, and seeing that there was no water handy for the thirsty. He was also the originator of taking up a collection on every occasion possible, but whether he had a monkey and hand-organ, or some other form of musical entertainment, we do not know.

Such a thing as giving just for the love of the cause did not suit his ideas, as people had too tight a grip on their shekels to yield them up without some extra inducement, and then outsiders would not chip in at all.

Tubal Cain was the inventor of brass; Judas worked it assiduously, but he is cast in the shade by some of his modern followers. When he gave strawberry festivals he did not hav the cheek to serve skim-milk over green berries and charge a quarter for a dime's worth. Nor did he hire a hall and giv a dance every night when the sand-train hands were paid off. Neither is there any record of his presenting theatricals or musical concerts in the church, the proceeds to go toward the purchase of a new organ.

The death of Judas shows remorse, and it is a pity that all of his methods did not die with him.—Denison, Tex., Gazetteer.

FROM whence, then, could arise the solitary and strange conceit, that the almighty, who had millions of worlds equally dependent on his protection, should quit the care of all the rest, and come to die in our world, because, they say, one man and one woman had eaten an apple? And, on the other hand, are we to suppose that every world in the boundless creation had an Eve, an apple, a serpent, and a redeemer? In this case, the person who is irreverently called the son of God, and sometimes God himself, would hav nothing else to do than to travel from world to world, in an endless succession of death, with scarcely a momentary interval of life.—Thomas Paine.

Senseless Oath-Taking.

The senseless absurdity of invoking supernatural aids to truth-telling in administering a judicial oath has been brought prominently before the Philadelphia public recently. A lot of Chinamen were arrested for playing their favorit gambling game, fantan, and to induce the pagan witnesses to tell the truth about the matter a chicken was brought into court and killed. The Tribune, of this city, criticised the action, and a newspaper discussion ensued on the question of what form of oath would really make a Chinaman tell the truth. The Tribune pointed out that the burning of paper with joss-sticks between lighted candles, as introduced in court, was first suggested in Malacca about half a century ago by an ignorant missionary, and that though considerably in vogue in Hong Kong from 1843 to 1857 it excited much derision among the Chinese. In 1851 the decapitation of the chicken was introduced, the idea being derived from the Canton river pirates, who used it as a pledge of good faith to one another. The British officials believed that the employment of this form of oath would confer credibility on the Chinaman's testimony, but the celestials had no such thought. The decapitation should properly be accompanied by the silent invocation of maledictions upon himself on the part of the witness; but as it was impossible to follow the witness's mental processes the rite was deemed by the Englishmen to be impracticable and thus rejected. It is asserted that no formality will impress upon the Chinese the sense of a religious obligation to speak the truth, and that to them no oath is binding.

Assistant District Attorney Boyle, who urged the Philadelphia judge to allow the chicken-killing, now explains that his solicitation was induced by the desire to employ whatever form of oath would best compel the witness to be honest. Chicken-killing is not properly an oath, he said, "but it is a means of getting at the truth, and as such is worthy of employment. There are no oaths in China, but this plan was employed in Portland with success, and I hav reason to believe that in this Philadelphia trial the witness who swore by the sputtering blood was impelled to stick closer to facts than any of his fellows through the fear that the pullet's spirit would harass him if he lied. I learned from parties on both sides of the case that the slaughter of a chicken would be absolutely binding on a Chinaman's conscience, and accordingly I urged Judge Bregy to allow the introduction of that rite. It would hav been impossible to elicit the truth unless some such course had been pursued. It would be folly to attempt to frighten a heathen Chinee into truth-telling by a mere threat of temporal punishment for perjury, for he would realize the difficulty of conviction and would be tempted to lie right and left. If there is any legitimate method by which the truth may be reached, that method should be employed. There is ample precedent for administering an oath or its substitute to a heathen or non-Christian in his own fashion. Wharton's 'Criminal Evidence' reads as follows:

"'While the common and regular way of swearing by a Christian is on the four evangelists, or on the New Testament, the general rule is that witnesses are to be sworn after a form the obligation of which they acknowledge.'

"Wharton then goes on to say that a Jew may be sworn by the Pentateuch alone with his head covered; a Mohammedan, on the Koran; a Gentoo, by touching with his hand the foot of a Brahman or priest of his religion; a Chinese, by breaking a china saucer. The proper way a Parsee should be sworn is by holding the tail of a cow, and it is reported that Sir James Mackintosh once had a heifer brought into the court-room in order to insure the truthfulness of a Parsee's testimony. There is Wharton's authority for swearing a Chinaman on a broken saucer, and a murdered rooster is only a slightly different step toward the accomplishment of the same end. I believe the criticism that has been made is unreasonable, and that in such a case the means is justified by the end."

This reasoning is all based on the idea that men will not tell the truth unless they are frightened by some supernatural agent. It is a low estimate of human nature, but not altogether without foundation, judging from the actions of the Christians. But is it true? We believe not. If men are not honest by nature and training, the invocation of the wrath of all the gods in the pantheon will not induce them to tell the truth. The other-world punishment is so remote that it has no influence at all on present conduct. Besides, there is always the chance, so the Christian believes, of repenting of his sins and evading any future punishment whatever. The Jesuits hav a mental reservation clause in their code of honesty, by which they can audibly lie, and silently reserve the truth. This to them is no false witness. A Jesuit on the witness-stand can lie like a priest and commit no sin. The Protestant, if he be dishonestly inclined, can lie and afterward repent and escape the supposed consequences. This part of the Protestant faith is a direct and open road for villainy. The supernatural agent is, in this, a help rather than a hindrance to false swearing.

But if a belief in some supernatural power is more potent in eliciting truth from witnesses than temporal punishment for perjury, why are laws enacted imprisoning perjurers? The greater—so the logicians assure us—includes the less; the fear of the supernatural is said by the Christians to be greater than the fear of earthly punishment; why, then, hav the perjury laws? Must our Christian lawmakers hav two strings to their bow like the man who put up a sign in his melon patch: Little boy, do not touch these melons, for God sees you—and they are green? And which do they really depend upon to protect their melons of truth—their unripe condition or the observing eye of God? Theoretically they trust in providence, but practically, in man-made laws and man-executed punishments. Their pious pretensions are, therefore, naught but hypocrisy.

The bald fact is, and the Christians know it, that religious oaths are null and void, and the pains and penalties of perjury are all that a dishonest man stands in fear of. To say that even a Chinaman is less afraid of a state prison than of the effect following lying when a saucer has been broken or a chicken killed in his presence, is to state the most improbable of things. Chinamen are like other human beings, and no judge ever knew a pious scoundrel to hesitate to lie because of his fear of other-world punishment. The experience of the world has proved that liars will be liars wherever they are; but a liar who knows that if detected he will be put in a prison cell, will be a little careful—of being detected! But his fear of God will not induce him to act with even that circumspection.

The whole farce of religious oaths should be abolished. Witnesses should simply be required to tell the truth, and punished if they do not.

What Are the Liberals Doing?

In THE TRUTH SEEKER a few weeks since we warned the people of the four new states recently admitted to the Union that the Christians would try to capture their constitutions, sending men and money from the East to do it. The issue of the Christian Statesman for June 20th, outlines their program. It says:

"Four new states are soon to be added to the American Union, viz.: North and South Dakota, Montana, and Washington. The constitution for South Dakota has already been framed. Constitutional conventions will meet on the 4th of July, to frame constitutions for the remaining three. In view of the vast importance of suitable Christian acknowledgments and provisions in these new instruments, one of our district secretaries has been commissioned to visit these conventions and to seek the coöperation of the Christian people of the territories in securing such declarations. This will involve not only the traveling expenses of the secretary, but the means necessary to reach pastors and others throughout the territories with documents and petitions. But could the committee hav done less, consistently with the responsibility which rests on the association in such a crisis?

"Sixteen special secretaries hav been appointed to press forward this movement along as many different and most important lines of work. Each of these national secretaries will be expected to secure as soon as possible, in each state, one who will coöperate with him in that department, thus looking forward to the employment of more than five hundred earnest and competent persons who will freely devote some part of their time to special labors in behalf of Christian government in the United States. The sixteen men and women already appointed must be supplied with means to defray necessary incidental expenses, such as postage, stationery, and literature in their respectiv departments. Or shall we ask them to make bricks without straw?"

Five hundred activ workers to be employed, reinforced by all the church members! Sixteen special secretaries to do nothing but look after the work! What are the Liberals doing? Is there even one man in each new state who is spending a day or a dollar to thwart the religious bigots who are trying to capture these states?

To Resist Catholic Aggression.

A Boston correspondent of the evening Post of this city reveals the formation of an organization to check Roman Catholic robbery of public treasuries. Leading New York and Boston men are identified with the movement, and the method proposed by them is the adoption of a national constitutional amendment which shall prohibit the states from using any public money for "sectarian" purposes. The form of the amendment is given:

"No state shall pass any law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or use its money, property, or credit or any power of taxation or appropriation, or authorize either to be used, for the purpose of founding or aiding any church, religious denomination, or religious society, or any sectarian institution, or any undertaking under sectarian or religious control."

The reason that New York and Boston are taking the lead is because Catholic aggressions hav been more pronounced in these cities than elsewhere. For a year or more the parochial school issue has been at the front in Boston, and the fact that within the last fifteen years the Catholics hav secured $12,000,000 of the public money in New York, has led to the activity in this city. One meeting has already been held in this city. The plan of campaign is to form both state and national organizations. At the meeting in this city the appointment of special committees was considered for the selection of a general agent to devote his entire time to the work of a committee on state organization, of another on national organization, of one to prepare a constitution for the organization, and of still another to prepare matter for publication and to oversee whatever went to the public through the press. The course to be followed with this proposed amendment is to correspond with fifty or a hundred leading men in the different professions and learn what their views are upon the subject, and get their suggestions. Already such correspondence has been opened with every state in the Union, and it is certain that activ support will be given all over the country. It is said here by those who are most interested in the matter that the public concern is deeper than is generally known. Thus far nothing of this movement has appeared in the newspapers; but wherever these gentlemen hav written they hav found that there was a deep interest to prevent the use of the public money for the support of the parochial schools of the Catholics, or for any Catholic institutions whatever.

This organization, of the purpose of which the foregoing is a meager outline, is the same that we mentioned in these columns last December. It was begun by the German Lutherans, led by Prof. George C. Seibert, of the Presbyterian seminary at Bloomfield, N. J. Though the proposed constitutional amendment is specious enough to satisfy even some Liberals, the work of the organization is to be directed not so much toward securing a purely Secular government as to thwart Roman Catholicism. The Presbyterians consider that they themselvs hav a perfect right to control the government, even to subsidizing their institutions.

However, as we said at the time, we welcome the war. There is need enough of some opposition to Rome that shall be effectiv, and the only way to force her to keep her hands off the government is to array her Protestant enemies against her, and fight it out at the polls. Already she has forced many cities to support her parochial schools—in Poughkeepsie, N. Y.; in New Haven, Waterbury, and New Britain, Conn.; in East St. Louis, Ill.; in various places in Minnesota and Wisconsin and Iowa, and in Southern cities. New York city contributes over half a million dollars annually to educate the vagrant children of Catholic parents in the superstition which has ruined these parents. Her policy was boldly enunciated by Bishop Chatard, of Indiana, when on a visit to New York last fall. In his speech at the cathedral he said that the cost to the Romish church of supporting its schools one year was $9,000,000, and "that money the public ought to pay and must pay, and we shall not cease demanding it till our demands are satisfied." The same position was taken by some of the Catholic witnesses before the Massachusetts legislativ committee on education in the course of the recent prolonged hearing over the parochial school question.

There hav been from time to time a few warnings given the public concerning this, and a feeble effort has occasionally been made to do something. Away back in 1859 the people of New York protested against giving the church so much money, and payment to some institutions was resisted. For a while after that the church got little; but in Tweed's time, she obtained property worth millions, and hundreds of thousands of dollars. Following the Tweed exposure she was obliged to retrench, but now she is as arrogant as ever. In 1876 both Republican and Democratic parties put a "non-sectarian" plank into their platforms, but it was grease to catch gudgeons, and meant nothing. In the same year Grant recommended Congress to adopt some amendment restraining the states from supporting churches, and acting upon that recommendation, James G. Blaine offered an amendment and it was carried in the House, but it did not receive a two-thirds vote in the Senate, and so never went to the states for their approval. At the last session of Congress Senator Hoar presented a petition from about twenty thousand citizens of Massachusetts for an article of amendment, "for submission to the legislatures of the several states for their approval or rejection, that will prevent the interference of any religious sect with the common school system or the appropriating of any of the public funds for sectarian uses, such a measure as this being, in our judgment, the only safeguard against religious encroachments, such as now threaten our time-honored and now truly endeared methods of teaching and training our youth for the duties and responsibilities of American citizenship." The hearing on this petition was given February 22d, and was so late in the session that no report was made upon it. There the matter rests.

That some amendment of this character must ultimately be adopted there can be no doubt. But the trouble will be to keep the Protestants out as well as the Catholics. The same men who are working for this amendment are also working for Blair's Sunday and educational amendments. That of itself is a very suspicious circumstance. But as these amendments are all coming up again at the next session of Congress, the Liberals will hav a chance to put in their arguments, and possibly something practical and good will come of it.

Editorial Notes.

ACCORDING to a decree published by the minister of education, no clergyman can in Italy be an inspector or director of a state school. This is based upon a recent law to the effect that the local control of schools should be in the hands of heads of families, who would naturally take a deep interest in their welfare. The leading object is to cut the schools loose from clerical oversight and influence, under which they hav been but training-places for Catholics.

THE Mail and Express prints the following dispatch:

"ROME, July 6th (Special by cable).—The preparations are well advanced for the departure of Pope Leo XIII. from the Vatican. He is now completing the list of the court personages who will accompany him. He has arranged a council for next Thursday. The cardinal vicar will remain in Rome with a part of the papal household. Senor Goizard, the Spanish embassador to the Vatican, arrived in Madrid yesterday and reported to the Spanish government the decision of the pope to quit Italy, and his desire to reside in Spain."

It is uncertain that this is correct. Other reports hav it that Leo will take up residence in the little principality of Monaco. If he does change his location, important consequences in European national relations will ensue. At all events, we can but smile with pleasure and encouragement at the persistence of the Italians in making things so uncomfortable for him.

AT Crete, Neb., there is an imitation Chautauqua, where religion and literature are indiscriminately mixed together, and the leading sermon on Sunday before last was by the Rev. George P. Hays, on the resurrection of Christ, furnishing complete "proof that Christ's death was genuin, and not a swoon or trance, and his resurrection genuin." Mr. Hays is to be congratulated upon having settled the question in a manner so satisfactory to himself, especially as about all the scholarship and common sense of the world are directly opposed to him.

THE Anti-Poverty Society celebrated the Fourth with speeches, and in the oration of John McMackin we find the first mention of one of the Revolution's greatest men that has occurred in the commemorativ exercises in this city, aside from Liberal meetings. Mr. McMackin said: "Writers of Revolutionary history hav united to blacken the character and belittle the ability of a man who perhaps did more than any other to giv this country the government it has—Thomas Paine." It was a Dr. McGlynn audience, more women than men, and mostly of Irish birth or descent, but the men cheered the name enthusiastically. We congratulate Dr. McGlynn upon the progress he is making in elevating his followers.

THE Christian Advocate contributes this to the debate as to whether Solomon went to hell or not. It is in answer to a question, "Will the Bible warrant us in believing in the return and salvation of Solomon?" Dr. Buckley says: "The Bible leaves Solomon in a position of the very greatest uncertainty and doubt. Jews, generally, speak of him as lost. Josephus givs no hint of his return. Among Christians the subject has been much debated. Chrysostom and the theologians of the Greek church are for the most part favorable, Augustine and those of the Latin for the most part adverse, to his chances of salvation. 2 Sam. vii, 13-16, says, speaking of the seed of Solomon: 'He shall build a house for my name, and I will stablish the throne of his kingdom forever. I will be his father, and he shall be my son. If he commit iniquity, I will chasten him with the rod of men, and with the stripes of the children of men; but my mercy shall not depart away from him, as I took it from Saul, whom I put away before thee. And thine house and thy kingdom shall be established forever before thee: thy throne shall be established forever.' This passage is used by some to show that Solomon was certainly saved, but it would prove altogether too much if interpreted in that way. It was a general declaration. The 'forever' there either does not mean without end or it has not been fulfilled. The progeny of David was there spoken of in a regal, and not in a personal, capacity." Does anyone know now whether Solomon was saved or not?

THE church of Scotland Jewish Mission seems to be as great a humbug as the English and American missions. In commenting upon its last annual report the Scotsman says: "If the mission could produce tangible and unquestionable evidence of its success, there would be no unwillingness to giv; but when we hav the confession that it is 'no use quoting familiar statistics which cannot be verified as to the number of Hebrew Christians,' the sponge is virtually thrown up. It is true the church is asked to accept in faith that a very large number of Jews hav, during the past fifty years, been received into the Christian church. How is that known if the statistics cannot be verified? Is it not a guess, and a guess on the side of the mission? The report has absolutely no consolatory feature. In some years there hav been accounts of one Jew, or two Jews and a half, converted by the mission. This year there is not even the fraction of a Jew. It is said that there are a number of 'interested inquirers,' and that numbers are prevented 'confessing' only from the fear of temporal consequences. That is to say, the 'interested inquirers' wanted to know what they can get in the way of temporal consequences by abjuring their Jewish faith. Punch long ago had a picture of a number of anglers standing patiently by the side of a stream. One asked another, 'Hav you had a bite yet?' 'No,' was the reply, 'I hav only been here a fortnight.' The Jewish Mission is in the same plight. 'Hav you got any results to show us?' ask those who are interested in the conversion of the Jews. 'No, nothing particular; we hav only been here fifty years.'"

THERE is a boom on for a World's Exposition to be held in this city during the summer of 1892 to celebrate the four-hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America. A reporter called on Chauncey Depew to get his opinion of the project. Mr. Depew favored it, and said: "The Exposition should be popular in its nature. It should be something which every man would take pleasure in going to and in taking his wife and all his children, even the babies, to see. The buildings should be spacious, and there should be other attractions besides the exhibits. It should be a place to which a man would want to go time after time, and the pleasure of going should be as great the last time as the first. I think it should be kept open on Sunday. There are people who could go better on Sunday than on any other day in the week. It would be a pity if anyone who desired to see the Exposition should not hav full and many opportunities. About the price of admission, I think that there should be fifty-cent days and twenty-five-cent days. It might be well to charge fifty cents on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday, and twenty-five cents on Saturday and Sunday. That would giv every workingman the opportunity to take his family to the Exposition without too much expense." Mr. Depew's words on the Sunday opening of such an exhibition are of interest, inasmuch as he is president of the New York Central railroad and recently pretended to take off, for alleged religious reasons, the Sunday freight trains on his road. But with an exposition here open on Sundays the Central would make a few thousand dollars per week extra. Mr. Depew seems to be a Sabbatarian for revenue only.

THE aim and object and principles of the Sabbath Union, which are the aim and object and principles of the whole church, were boldly divulged in a discussion in the Missouri Sabbath convention whether "the law of God" is, in any sense, the foundation of the Sabbath laws of the state. Secretary Gault earnestly maintained the affirmativ, and after some dissenting opinions had been expressed, Mr. W. P. Gray, the secretary of the convention, said: "I for one hav made this question very much of a study, especially that topic of it. To appeal to divine authority in our legislation on this subject would be to fundamentally change the law of our land, or the principle adopted by our fathers when they said that all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. I for one do not believe that, as a political maxim, governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. And I believe with Mr. Gault on this, I think. And so the object of this movement is an effort to change that feature in our fundamental law. Jefferson was under the influence of French ideas when the Constitution was framed; and that had something to do with leaving God out of the Constitution. And I think that the providential history of this country will compel us to come back to that and recognize God in our Constitution. And I see in this reform a providence teaching us the necessity of recognizing something else besides the will of the people as the basis of government." There it is. People, according to these Sabbatarians, hav no right to govern themselvs. God must do it, and do it, of course, through his anointed—the kings and emperors and priests. That is what the pious bigots are after—the control of the world. It is not putting it too strong to say that those holding with Mr. Gray are traitors. Their loyalty to their "God" is treason to their country.

THE crop of Christs looks promising. Mr. Schweinfurth has an imitator in a South Carolina evangelist who calls himself Jesus Christ and has won the faith of hundreds of negroes who hav heard him preach. He goes through the country crying, "Giv up everything and follow me. Let your crops go; turn your cattle in the patches; the Lord will provide for you." And, obeying him, hundreds of negroes hav quit work. Their crops hav grown up with weeds; the planters hav been deserted by their laborers; the turpentine manufacturers and the sawmill men hav difficulty in getting help enough to continue operations. To such an extent has the craze spread that the intelligent colored people and the whites joined in discussing some plan to put a stop to it. It was decided to arrest the crank or send him out of the country. Some were ready to lynch him. When the officers went to arrest him no resistance was offered, but a large crowd soon joined the disciples about him. They were ready to tear the officers to pieces, but at their prophet's request they suffered him to be taken quietly away. He shows scars in his hands which he says were made by nails when he was crucified on Calvary. His hair and beard are long and shaggy. The negroes fall down and worship him, and kiss his hands and feet, and anoint him. At his bidding women hav left their husbands and men their families to follow him. His familiarity with the scriptures is exceptional. He has told the people that he will go back to heaven in a chariot of fire at an early date, but the chances are that he will go to an insane asylum, so little do the Christians of to-day believe in what they will solemnly assert took place eighteen hundred and odd years ago. If you want a Christian to believe in a real solid impossibility, you must date it back a few centuries.

THE kind of people the French Canadian Catholics are was well illustrated at the second day's session of the tenth national convention of French Canadians held in this city last week. It had been the custom to open each session with prayer. Chaplain Notebaert had made the usual invocation, the delegates kneeling upon the floor. After the prayer the Rev. Father F. X. Chagnon, of Champlain, arose and said that there was one of the delegates who had failed to kneel in accordance with the custom. All eyes were at once turned to a tall, smooth-faced, silver-haired man who sat in the rear of the hall, and whose anti-religious opinions seemed to be generally known among the delegates. "This is a convention of Catholic French Canadians," said Father Chagnon, "and it is binding upon all its members to conform to its regulations." "What is your excuse?" asked President Bossue of the silver-haired member. "I hav no excuse. I was not aware that I required a ticket of confession to be entitled to the privileges of the convention." Father Chagnon moved that the offending member be expelled and that his name be stricken from the roll. The motion was carried unanimously after a short and spirited discussion. "If I had been hypocrit enough to do as the others did this would not hav happened," said the expelled member as he grasped his hat and cane and strode indignantly out of the hall. He afterward turned and watched the proceedings from the gallery. To a reporter he said he was Joseph Duval, a carpenter and builder of 146 East Eighty-fourth street. He was a regularly elected delegate of the French Canadian National Democratic Club, which meets at 1,893 Second avenue. He said he had been bred a Roman Catholic, but since he had become of age he had been a Freethinker and did not purpose to play the part of a hypocrit. He called the convention a body of bigots, and his opinion is about right. The French Catholics care more for their church than for anything else on earth, and their allegiance to the pope is placed away ahead of their allegiance to the secular government.

Letters from Friends.

SAGINAW CITY, MICH., June 24, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I see that you are in all the time for a straight fight, and I confess that you are able to hold your own with any of them. I think that the old TRUTH SEEKER holds its venerable head high, and in no way takes second place. Success to it and its noble defender. J. H. BURNHAM.

DEL MAR, CAL., June 20, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: The illustrations by Heston afford me a great amount of pleasure. He is not excelled by any man living as an artist. His pictures are volumes. They tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, as it is recorded in the Book of Fables. Long liv Heston, that he may enjoy the fruits of his labors. H. L. SHAUG.

ROSEDALE MILLS, N. S., June 20, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I will try and send you a new subscriber this coming fall. I liv in an isolated place nearly two miles from the nearest house. Very few will read Freethought. Most of them will burn without reading. I travel around the country some this summer, and spread what I can.

EDWARD BROWNELL.

GRIDLEY, KAN., June 23, 289.

MR. EDITOR: Gen. Harrison Kelley, of my county, has been elected for the Fourth district of Kansas to take the place of Thomas Ryan, now minister to Mexico. General Kelley is a subscriber, or has been, to THE TRUTH SEEKER. And you can now tell how the fourth district of Kansas will stand on the Blair bill, and every other bill that would tend to take away the freedom of the American people.

My opinion is that the West is more alive to the work in our cause than is the East. Look well to it.

C. H. CUSTENBORDER.

MONTAGUE, TEX., June 27, 289.

MR. EDITOR: This agitation of thought is doing much good. So let us keep on in the good work. Future generations will be benefited if we are not. Orthodoxy will hav to die out before there can be much progress. Ingersoll said that inferiority was stamped upon every Christian brain. It is so here, for these deluded Christians here can't find room for a new idea. These are all the time telling their God some strange nonsense. Some of them hav taken a great interest in the salvation of my soul lately, but I hav no time to spend hearing such nonsense. If they want to fool away their time with such nonsense, I suppose they hav a right to so long as they don't interfere with the rights of others.

Yours truly, GEO. W. CARPENTER.

HAY SPRINGS, NEB., June 17, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Mary Baird Finch, in your paper of the 15th, says that "the people of this state hav never known anything but hard times." I am fully aware that the policy of this as well as of former administrations is to reduce the circulating medium, and that plenty of money means plenty of work and good pay, good markets, and no paupers. But the facts are that Nebraska is the most favored state in the Union, and that anyone coming here with $500 in money and ordinary health, strength, and intelligence can hav as fine a home in five years as the average $10,000 farm in northern Illinois. I say, sell your debts in Eastern places and come here where there is free land, where crops are unequaled, and where we are trying to colonize Liberals, and you will be out of debt and happy.

Yours for Universal Mental Liberty, E. W. MINER.

CHAMPLIN, MINN., June 10, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I send you an order for the continuance of the good old TRUTH SEEKER. I wish you to know that I think you persist too much in using that abominable word, Agnostic, to designate Freethinkers and Infidels. When that name is applied to me, I take it for an epithet meaning: You lack firmness in belief on the God question. You know as well as and better than I, that the non-existence of a thing can be sufficiently proved by demonstration of the utter lack of any testimony of its existence. Until Deists prove that twice two are five, or turn a wheel in opposit directions in the same moment, or prove that time had a beginning, or that the universe has a boundary, they may be sure that I will remain a firm Atheist. There is no name under the heavens that will classify us so well as the word Infidel. I. KINSER.

ADRIAN, MICH., June 28, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me to utter sentiments for and against J. H. Wood and C. L. James. Both want the Constitution revised to suit the crowd. One claims Anarchy is the medicin that will heal the nation's wounds. The other thinks the promis to pay of every jackass is good enough. James thinks he can convert Wood to Anarchy. Wood does not claim he can convert James. But each wants a change, and seems to wish for the other's compliance with his theory. What a consistent condition of government would be realized did things conform to their liking! Now, do not fire back at me; I was shot nearly to death in the recent war, and hope to die a natural death. You both are possessed of undoubted ability; use that weapon in slugging old orthodoxy and superstition. Let priests and their craft be the target. Do not spare them; they would not spare you. Had they the power, and the receptacle hell, they would not hesitate to consign you there. Show them how despicable they appear to reason and science.

The miracles claimed at the Johnstown calamity need a little notice. The miracle of the preservation of the Virgin's image and the Catholic nuns in the chapel has been held up in our churches here as a big thing and as an interposition of God. Why did he interfere in behalf of such inferior objects as a dumb image and a few ignorant devotees to the scalawag popery? The absurdity is not worth the ink to expose it—too thin for a moment's thought. Theology in its dying throes clutches at anything to bolster it up in its spasms. The parasite dogma dies hard. The obituary is already written. It will need no coroner's decision.

O. S. BARRETT.

MARSHFIELD, ORE., June 19, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: We cannot do without THE TRUTH SEEKER. I would try for some new subscribers, but know that it is useless. Money has been raised to build two new churches in the town of Marshfield just lately, one Catholic and one Episcopal. The Episcopals hav a Ladies' Guild here, and there are not over three prominent ladies here that do not belong to it. I see by the last TRUTH SEEKER that Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel is about to come to the Pacific coast on a lecture tour. If it were not for the disagreeable journey over the mountains to this place I should urge her to come here and see if one in female attire would not arouse some of them from their orthodox lethargy.

Just at present I am reading "A Helping Hand," given me to read by an Episcopal lady friend. It is written by Charles T. Russell. If my Liberal friends wish to strengthen their Infidelity it is worth reading. It abounds in scripture quotations showing a carefully predestinated plan of salvation and an aristocracy even among the redeemed, the chosen few being the elect to assist Christ in judging the world at his second coming. Eternal death and everlasting life take in the whole of heaven and hell. At the second coming of Christ we shall all hav a chance at forbidden fruit as Adam did, and then if we obey the divine commands, we shall inherit the kingdom. If we disobey, we die eternally without any scorching at all. So really it is a good doctrin, saving the serpentine manner of its compiling and its difficulty of comprehension. But it is an improvement on what I was taught in my youth, clearly showing the evolution at work, even of Christians.

We expect Mr. Bell here to giv a series of lectures the last of this month, and Mr. Putnam the last of next month, so you see Liberalism is still activ in Coos county, even if churches are building. C. S. HILBORN.

GRANGER, O., June 24, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5. Please send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year to a new subscriber. The balance apply to my subscription. You see we gain a little. Six TRUTH SEEKERS are now taken in these parts. Let the good cause go on. When mankind try to learn how to liv in this world and stop fooling around about another world, and God, spirits, and the soul, there will be some hopes of happiness here. What does it all amount to anyway? If there ever was a God, he has most probably laughed himself to death before now. Just think—not until about three hundred years ago did man know the earth revolved. He knew all about God and heaven; was well posted in regard to hell. Compare a sermon of fifty years ago with one to-day. Can any God withstand such a change? Just think of a religion where they send missionaries to the heathen and tell them their forefathers that knew not of th's religion are all in hell. It's enough to split the sides of a stone god. I suppose I am ignorant about Gods and spirits. It seems to me they are never in the right place. I read that at the Johnstown disaster a little girl dressed in white, eight years old, was on a raft, hands folded, face turned heavenward, calling on God to save. No heed given. I read the sad story of Mrs. Fenn, who lost her husband and seven children, when the little four-year-old put her arms about her mother's neck and said: "You said God would take care of me, mamma; will he take care of me now? I am not afraid." It was the last sweet kiss. That mother, it said, is going back to her girlhood home and try to think. Where was the God? Watching sparrows fall, or perhaps attending some protracted meeting. Where were the spirits that hover around their earthly friends and do so much good? Scratching between two slates or knocking on some table where it could do no good. It's funny, isn't it? I say, let us learn to liv in this world without end. Amen. L. N.

PORTSMOUTH, O., June 30, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: This place might appropriately be called the "city of churches" About twenty rear their steeples toward the "blue-domed canopy." The Catholic, the Episcopalian, the Presbyterian, the Methodist, the Baptist, the United Brethren, and the Campbellite denominations are represented in this score of God-houses—structures to support idleness, and monuments to the barbaric past. Their presence in the community does not tend in the least to lessen dissipation and crime. About their outside walls creep poisonous vines that we may call the vines of superstition, and inside flies the bat of ignorance. He who enters and is "born again" becomes a slave, intellectually, waiving his right to reason, to observe, and to investigate. One-third of this city's population (fifteen thousand souls) are numbered as intellectual slaves. According to the Bible, should the judgment occur to-morrow these five thousand people would be saved, that is, they would join the angelic orchestra in the New Jerusalem. The remaining ten thousand would be lost; eternal torment would be their portion. The dishonest believer would hav the opportunity of smiling from his celestial abode at the honest unbeliever in hell. Virtue would be punished and vice rewarded. These statistics are given in order to show that the Infidel will not be short of company on his trip to the "fiery regions."

The churches are losing a few of their members. These few are going to the side of the Seventh Day Adventists, who are still holding forth under canvass. The preachers do not like the "elders" who are proclaiming the second coming of Christ, for the reason that they take from them tithes and missionary money, and further because they favor the separation of church and state. As to this latter they circulate petitions, and signers are not very far between—they are counted by the hundreds.

Our city is soon to hav a military academy, and the grandest thing that can be said regarding it is, that it is to be non-sectarian. It has for its motto: "A sound mind in a trained body."

In conclusion I desire to say that every year finds the church weaker. Nearer and nearer we are getting to the time when Reason will succeed Christ, and the religion of Humanity will prevail. Then, and not till then, will there be "peace on earth, good will to men." WILL S. ANDRES.

STEUBENVILLE, O., June 28, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: In consideration of the attitude of the Catholic church on our public schools, would it not be well for the nativ and adopted citizens to look well into the consequences likely to follow the continuance of our present naturalization laws, giving the suffrage to hundreds of thousands of ignorant, bigoted foreigners, who do the bidding of the pope of Rome in all circumstances, and who publicly declare their allegiance to the pope greater than their allegiance to the country? Would it not be well to stop giving the privilege of suffrage to these hordes of ignorant men, made so by the church they so blindly follow? It declares war on our public school system, and uses these ignorant hordes to vote down our schools and vote the money of the taxpayers into the pockets of the priests, who use it to support parochial schools to train the children of these ignorant hordes into aliens, teaching them a higher allegiance than allegiance to their country? Is it not time to repeal the naturalization laws that put a club into the hands of the church to beat our own heads? Every means is used to get these men over here, killing two birds with one stone—first to aid the church in the overthrow of our school system, and in it the only safeguard to our liberties, and at the same time overcrowding the labor market, so that in a short time they may hav us all in the same condition they hav the masses in all countries where that church has the ascendency. Let the people look out in time, and stop the naturalization of these people. Giv the suffrage to none but nativ-born citizens. And if these foreigners continue to make aliens of their progeny in their parochial schools, let the laws be so made that any man coming of age without attending the public non-sectarian schools at least three sessions be disfranchised. This appears to me to be the only way to guard our liberties against the encroachments of the Catholic church—whose doctrins would enslave the whole of mankind, for it declares the pope above all states, kings, or emperors.

What folly it is to pay out millions to support our public schools so that we may hav an intelligent body of voters, and at the same time allow these hordes of ignorant aliens to vote and kill the intelligent vote, that we spend so much money to foster, knowing that without general intelligence among the voters the republic must be a failure! J. D.

SANTA ANA, CAL., June 20, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I would like to briefly answer one or two of the queries propounded by Jeremiah O'Brien in THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 15th. He says: "Assuming that those spirits do exist somewhere in the vast unknown, and judging from all the manifestations we hav had so far, we must inevitably conclude that they care very little about us, or else they hav but very little power to hear or to help us. Which is it?" From my knowledge of the subject I say the latter. They profess little power on our physical plane. Mr. O'Brien continues: "In either case I don't think I should care to be among them. I should hav no desire to liv in a society where I was destined to become callous or indifferent to the welfare of my fellow-beings. And surely I would never be willing to emigrate to a country where freedom of action and liberty of movement is more restricted than it is here." These sentences show that Friend O'Brien is exceedingly ignorant of the teachings of Spiritualism. It does not teach that we ever "become callous or indifferent to the welfare of our fellow-beings." But contrariwise, that we grow more sympathetic and interested in all that pertains to our fellow-beings. It teaches that our spirit friends shed tears of suffering over the misfortunes of loved ones in earth life and rejoice over our victories and happiness. It also teaches that "freedom of action and liberty of movement" is much greater in spirit life than here. We are restricted in action and movement to this planet; while, if Spiritualism be true, the citizens of the spirit spheres are not wholly restricted to their spheres, but can to some extent act and move on this material sphere. Certainly all the teaching of accredited Spiritualism is to the effect that spirit beings desire to aid earthly beings, and under favorable circumstances can do so in a limited manner. And if Friend O'Brien will giv a little earnest, careful study to the current Spiritualistic literature, he will discover that the "politics and social ethics of the spiritual country" hav been treated of quite extensivly, and that a "short message can be written on one slate as well as two."

But I object to objectors against Spiritualism denouncing us as being easily "excited" people, who "allow sharpers to fool us." One dislikes to think that such utterances are malicious falsehoods. But what is one to think when it is repeated over and over again by the most intelligent and sound-minded people in this country and other countries, that their conversion to Spiritualism was similar to my own—brought about through sitting in daylight in my own room, in my own house, with no one else present to the physical senses but my sister or my wife?

Gentlemen, you hav never approached a solution of these stubborn facts.

Yours for truth, honesty, and kindliness,

D. EDSON SMITH.

PINE WOODS, N. Y., July 2, 289.

MR. EDITOR: I read with much interest the answer of Mr. Chapman in your paper of June 22d to the queries of Mr. Hammond in that of June 1st. Now, although Mr. Chapman reasons clearly and conclusivly concerning the law of gravitation, I cannot accept his conclusion as to the first query, "for the following reason:" While a person might without injury jump to the bottom of a well six feet deep, it would be a little dangerous to jump to the bottom of one sixteen feet deep, nor do I think he would reach the bottom more gently if the depth were extended to sixty, or even six hundred feet. Now, I am no "scientist," and may entertain wrong notions about the matter, and I hoped the question would be further discussed in the next paper, but as it was not, I beg leave to present my views, in the hope that some one better informed may kindly point out whatever errors may appear.

Three factors enter into the solution of the problem—the attraction of gravitation, the inertia of the stone, and the resistance of the atmosphere. The effect of the first has already been ably discussed by Mr. Chapman. My understanding of the law of inertia is that, though a body at rest will always remain so until moved by some force, yet when once moved by any force it will always maintain the motion until counteracted by some equivalent force. If this idea is correct, then a stone placed in the opening at the surface of the earth and submitted to the law of gravitation would move perpetually with all the velocity of its first impulse, even if the law of gravitation were entirely suspended immediately after starting. Hence the effect of the continuance of the action of gravitation would be to increase the velocity, and consequently the force of inertia, of the stone. Therefore the only effect of the decrease in the force of gravitation as the stone approaches the center of the earth would be to decrease the rate of acceleration of the stone's velocity.

Now, when the stone reached the center, having retained in its inertia all the force acquired by the action of gravitation in its descent, that force of inertia could only be counteracted by an equivalent amount of gravitation in its ascent to the opposit side of the earth, which could not be until it reached the surface.

But what appears to me to be the most difficult factor to be considered is the resistance of the air. This of course would depend on its density, and although its density at the surface of the earth has been ascertained, yet it seems to be a mooted point whether that density is created by the pressure from a hight of two hundred miles above, or only forty-five miles. So it seems the data are unreliable for calculating the density at the earth's center. But as my limited experience enforces on me the conviction that falling bodies increase in velocity below the surface of the earth in spite of atmospheric resistance, so the stone would necessarily be carried beyond the center in spite of it. B. M. KNAPP.

AUSTIN, TEX., April 28, 289.

MR. EDITOR: Against the ignoble crusade of Infidelity to which your vile sheet (which I sometimes buy at the news-stands) is devoted, I beg to contrast a few items that present a most cheerful outlook for that brighter cause for which the angels of earth are battling.

During a four months' siege of the Salvation Army in this city we hav converted one hundred and forty-nine head of sinners and the end is not yet. I could hav said the round one hundred and fifty head, but for the backsliding of one unfortunate wretch, who is therefore not counted. He came up to the altar, applied for salvation, repented, and seemed to be fully salvated; but he crawfished on us after being regularly tallied into the fold. It is too sad to contemplate his dreary but rapid journey down the broad, steep road leading to that sulphuric crematory where even ashes would be unspeakable relief from bodily torture, while his more fortunate because more faithful comrades glide evenly and serenely along the narrow but smooth and flowery macadamized road that leadeth up into green pastures of glory.

But it is consoling to find that the average sinner is not hard to convert. When one seriously repents the job is half done; and when he then shows up a fair measure of faith in the salvation racket he is our goose meat. With some, however, the ordeal is very harrowing before reaching this stage of the process. The sinner feels as if crushed to earth with a four-ton saw-log of guilt upon his neck. In a throe of remorse he imagins himself tottering upon the slippery brink of a boiling, seething caldron of molten brimstone; he feels the cold lizard of death creep up his back and then switch back down the railway of his spinal column; and in horror and despair he shrieks aloud that he is the boss of sinners!

And this is the proper course for a tough, obdurate sinner. In fact, he should be made to feel that he is the refuse, the offscouring, the veritable yellow dog of all sinners; that his doom is irrevocably sealed; and that he is absolutely in the nine hole with no way of escape but through the grace of salvation. He can then rightly appreciate the boon of relief that comes to his burdened and benighted soul as the welkin rings with loud rejoicing:

I'm glad salvation's free.

The words of the song, however, hav a purely spiritual meaning, and are not at all to be taken in a literal sense; for it takes money to wage war against the devil. And the sinner who expects salvation shoved at him like ice-water in December is off his base and in a fair way to lose his immortal soul.

Nowadays there is too much of that selfish and worldly solicitude which we find forbidden in the sacred word: "What shall we eat, what shall we drink, and wherewithal shall we be clothed?" While extravagance at the festal board and the tyranny of fashion and pride in dress are holding mad riot in the land there is too little left of this world's goods to do justice to the cause of salvation. There was no raiment of purple and fine linen for plain John the Baptist, clad in pantaloons of gunny sack cloth and with nothing upon his back but a coat of black jack ashes; no menu of savory viands and dyspeptic delicacies when he came into the wilderness wiping the wild honey from his mustache with the furry tail of a rude coon-skin cap; but with beard betangled with locust-bug legs he preached salvation to a sinful world with a rustic simplicity that eclipsed all the splendors of modern Christianity. CORPORAL.

2 N. 4TH STREET, ST. LOUIS, MO., June 20, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of June 15th are two communications to which I would like to reply.

First, Lois Waisbrooker takes Spiritualist societies to task for refusing to allow a discussion of the labor question. I quit the Spiritualist Society of this city because they wanted nothing but Spiritualism, as its president said.

Second, "Zoa Topsis," alias Dr. Gray, givs the third notice of the late organization of a Secular Society in this city which has appeared in your paper, and as my name was given each time as one of the vice-presidents, I am getting tired of it under the circumstances. I happened to attend the meeting at the time of electing the officers, without any intention of joining, but only hoping to hear a free discussion of some practical question. Then, feeling that we could hav lectures and free discussion on all subjects relating to the improvement and welfare of society, in which I am always interested, I joined. But, strange to say, after the organization one of the members said that the meetings must be restricted to the consideration of nothing but the Nine Demands of Liberalism. And since that Dr. Gray states that such is also the instruction received from Secretary Stevens. If this is the case, I shall hav to drop the Secular Society the same as I did the Spiritualists.

Now as to why I am tired about these repeated notices of the St. Louis Secular Society. I am ashamed to hav my name mentioned as an officer or member of a society that holds no meetings and shows no signs of life whatever, which is the case with this one. At the second meeting of the society we had only four members present, and Dr. Gray being absent I presided, and called on our speaker, Prof. C. L. Haskell, for his promised address on "The Foolishness of Prayer." It was hard for me to get him to speak to our audience of only six persons, but finally his zeal for the cause got the better of him and we had a rich treat in the way he handled his subject, for not only the foolishness but also the absurdity of prayer was shown in a masterly manner. Then each of the audience took a turn with additional remarks without the least restriction as to their scope, whether on or off the question, and we all had as good a time as though the hall had been crowded to overflowing.

Then the question arose as to continuing the meetings, and getting a downtown hall. During the week I found a good and cheap hall, and it was reported to the president and other members; but, like a flock of sheep who will never jump till the bell-wether first leaps, the one waited for the other, and all waited for the president, and he said he must go to the country for a sniff of fresh air nearly every Sunday during the summer, and so could not be depended on to take the lead.

And thus the St. Louis Secular Society remains defunct for the lack of a leader. When any man accepts the office of president of a society, he should make it his first duty to perform the duties of his office, or step down and out of his honored position. There is plenty of good material in this city for a large and flourishing society if some competent and devoted person would take the trouble to lead them.

Respectfully submitted, A. LONGLEY.

UNCASVILLE, CONN., June 17, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: IN THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 25th is an engraving which is called, "Sunday as the Sabbatarians Want It." The offices of the physician and surgeon are closed, also the hospital and the undertaker's establishment. The sexton is represented as refusing to work, and a policeman forbids the minister's preaching. There is not a Sabbatarian in the world who wants a Sunday like this. It does no good to make such gross misstatements.

Out of a dozen Freethinking publications on my desk, there is hardly any that I would show to Christians unless I wanted to exasperate them. One of these publications has a beautiful sketch of Colonel Ingersoll's daughters. Alongside of it is another article very bitter against Christianity—but very true. In it I find the following:

O loved and loving Ingersoll!
O star of morning and of liberty!
O bringer of the light,
Forerunner of the day that is to be!
Thou art the pride of all freemen, of all Freethought,
The only god of our idolatry.

If I was Colonel Ingersoll, I should feel like a fool to see anything like that about me in print, and it certainly would not raise Liberalism in the estimation of outsiders. It is no worse than what Colonel Ingersoll himself has written of Thomas Paine, but I don't believe in idolatrous admiration in anyone.

The leading article in another Liberal paper treats of a subject too delicate to be mentioned here. The more delicate a theme is the more some people seem possessed with a desire to discuss it as publicly as possible, and they ought to be turned away as promptly as the editor of the Boston Congregationalist once turned away Mrs. Isabella Beecher Hooker when she offered some articles, that she afterward published in pamphlet form—under the title of "Womanhood," I think it was.

A writer in another of these papers describes the life of Christ as if it happened at the present time, and he so distorts Christ's words and acts that one can scarcely recognize the original in the caricature. It is unjust, and, Infidel as I am, it repelled me. Such an article does harm to our cause. It is manifestly unfair.

Nearly all of these ably conducted sheets contain articles that spoil the paper to circulate among Christians. I am stopping with a Christian family, but I will not show my Infidel papers to them, for it would prejudice them all the more against my cause.

The fact is, we are not altogether free from bigotry ourselvs, and suffer in consequence. Bigotry is prevalent everywhere. There is scarcely a political paper of any party that I take up which would not make friends for the enemy if circulated among the lukewarm. And even among those not lukewarm, the effect is sometimes injurious. My free trade opinions inclined me last year to sever my connection with the Republican party. Some friend sent me a Democratic paper, which made so many false statements that I was disgusted and remained on the Republican side. I ask for no better ally than an enemy who is unfair and purposely misrepresents my side of the case. I sincerely regretted the death of the late Bishop Gilbert Haven, of the Methodist Episcopal church. He could make more offensiv misstatements within a given time than almost anyone I ever knew. Wherever he went skeptics and Infidels were sure to be found. However, Judge Black, Joseph Cook, and several others remain, so I am not disconsolate.

JAMES W. FITCH.

TUSCALOOSA CO., ALA., June 20, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: In some of the back numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER I saw that a subscriber had offered to affirm in a court, and, being refused, lost his suit; and that Judge Sprott gets angry, or seems to, and denies ever refusing such an offer. I will relate what I saw and heard in the last court held in Tuscaloosa—the state against Dinah Marks for murder. Among the many that were refused as incompetent for jurors were two that I will mention. Mr. Victor Friedman was asked if he would convict on circumstantial evidence. He said No, and was told to stand aside. But after he started and got off a piece Judge Sprott called to him, "Mr. Friedman, would you not convict if it were ever so strong?" "No, sir." The next was Mr. Burton. He was asked if he would convict on circumstantial evidence. "No, sir." "Mr. Burton," said Judge Sprott, "if you were to see a man go into a room and then another go in and you should hear the report of a pistol and one came out with a pistol in his hand smoking, what would you say?" "I would say nothing," said Mr. Burton. "Would you convict on that?" said Judge Sprott. "No, sir," said Burton. The judge remarked that was strange; then said he would take that back. The question I want to ask every thinking man is, Why would not these two men believe in circumstantial evidence? It was not for lack of intelligence, for they are as intelligent men as Tuscaloosa holds. It was not for the lack of honesty and truth, for there is not aught against them. In a few days comes Mr. Black as a prosecuting witness for the state—a man that stands as fair as the two mentioned above. He was asked if he believed in a future existence of rewards and punishments. "I hope so," said Mr Black. "Answer the question," said Judge Sprott. "I certainly do," said Mr. Black. "He is competent," said the judge. (I may not hav quoted verbatim all that was asked Black, but hav given the gist of it.) Now, the point I wish to make is, why don't all men think alike? Out of the one hundred men summoned, and after exhausting several venires from the house, they got twelve jurors that were competent and thought alike in that case. Why were not Burton and Friedman disqualified from testifying because they differ on a cardinal point in a certain kind of evidence? If Mr. Black had said, "I don't know whether I shall ever liv again or not. Whether there is a hell or heaven I don't know, but if there is one I am willing to suffer for the wrong I do," would Judge Sprott hav allowed him to testify? If men differ on what they know something about, where the evidence is open and tangible, how can they be expected to believe on something they know nothing about? If believers all testified the truth, it would be another thing; but they don't, and Judge Sprott knows they don't.

If Judge Sprott had been born in Turkey, he would hav believed in the god of Mohammed; or had he been born in Utah he would hav believed in the god of Joe Smith. Two centuries ago if a man had said he did not believe in witches it would hav cost him his life, or his civil rights at least. Now in this nineteenth century if he says he has studied a great deal and has come to the truth of the matter, and says he does not know, he loses his civil rights, and if he is mobbed or has an honest debt he can be robbed by the meanest of human kind, just so his oppressor believes in a hell; and there is no remedy. Men occupying the position of judge ought not to pander to such ignorant barbarism. Why did not Judge Sprott say he allowed all persons to testify if they had not lost their right by some crime that bars them? A man that has the courage to speak what his brain thinks, with the prejudice that is against him, is much more competent to tell the truth than an ignorant hypocrit. The Blue laws of the Puritans required that a man must belong to the church before he could vote, hold office, or be a juror, yet those God believers could take and burn innocent women for witches. I wonder if Judge Sprott believes there ever was a witch. Yet the God he wants a man to believe in said, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to liv." I wish he could hav a vision of a Puritan judge giving his rulings on witchcraft. Every time a man takes an oath he virtually acknowledges: "I will tell a lie, but if you swear me I shall hav to tell the truth." It is a great honor to a Christian to say a man shall not hav the liberty he himself exercises. It is what tyrants hav always gloried in. A FREETHINKER.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Boy Who Wants to Know.

Grandma Goff said curious things—
"Boys may whistle, but girls must sing."
That's the very thing I heard her say
To Kate no longer than yesterday.

"Boys may whistle." Of course they may,
If they pucker their lips the proper way.
But for the life of me I can't see
Why Kate can't whistle as well as me.

"Boys may whistle, but girls must sing."
Now, I call that a curious thing.
If boys can whistle, why can't girls, too?
It's the easiest thing in the world to do.

First you do that, then you do this—
Just like you were fixing up for a kiss.
It's a very poor girl, that's all I say,
Who can't make out to do that way.

"Boys may whistle," but girls may not;
A whistle's a song with the noise knocked out!
Strayed off somewhere down the throat,
Everything lost but the changeful note.

So if boys can whistle and do it well,
Why cannot girls, will somebody tell?
Why can't they do what a boy can do?
That's the thing I should like to know.

I went to father and asked him why
Girls couldn't whistle as well as I?
And he said, "The reason that girls must sing
Is because a girl's a singular thing."

And grandma laughed till I knew she'd ache,
When I said I thought it all a mistake.
"Never mind, little man," I heard her say,
"They'll make you whistle enough, some day."

Not for Me.

There will come a time in the future when a number of bright young men will be together. They will be, some of them, the boys who now read these words. One of them will produce a bottle of wine or something stronger. All will be invited to taste it, and if it were but tasting once there would be no harm done. But some will taste again and again and so often that the brain will be benumbed. Some will taste while conscience and good judgment protest against it. Others will swallow it because they fear to be ridiculed if they do not. With some it will prove the first seed of a drunkard's life. Character, honesty, will power, all that makes life beautiful and bright, will fade away before the subtle influence of the demon drink when once it obtains a foothold in the life of man. What is the only safe course? It is to let it alone. It is to hav courage to say "No!" It is to decline every invitation to drink as a beverage anything that intoxicates and leads astray. Every temptation resisted, every evil inclination resisted, makes a boy or man, a girl or woman, stronger and nobler. Then when temptations come in any form, shape, or fashion, let everyone hav the courage to say emphatically, "Not for me!" S. H. W.

Maxims to be Remembered.

When I was a child it was the custom in our schools for the children to be called upon, sometimes every morning and sometimes only upon stated occasions, to repeat texts from the Bible, or verses of hymns. I think this was a very good plan for fastening in the minds of the young such ideas as it was considered right, by their parents and teachers, they should imbibe and remember. In my own case I know that the texts I learned when a child—many of which contained precepts that are jewels of truth and morality—often come to my mind and stimulate me to exertion or remove doubt and anxiety. One which has been to me as a fixed star is the injunction: "Prove all things—hold fast that which is good." It is by following this rule that I hav become a Liberal.

Now, I think the children of Liberals should be trained to memorize every day, or at least frequently, verses or maxims which will abide with them throughout their lives, and ever prompt them to right thought and action. Some time ago I began a collection of maxims for use in a reader I was preparing for my pupils; and a few days since it occurred to me that perhaps the children who read Miss Wixon's Corner in The Truth Seeker would like to memorize these beautiful maxims. If often repeated, they will be as guiding stars in your path through life.

1. Love all; trust a few; do wrong to none.
2. Do what you ought, and let what will come of it.
3. He that has a trade has an estate.
4. The purse may provide pleasure, but cannot provide happiness.
5. Where there is no good there is apt to be evil.
6. Idleness is the great mother and nurse of discontent.
7. Labor and perseverance will, in time, remove mountains.
8. Nothing that is excellent can be wrought suddenly.
9. Life is to be measured by action, not by time.
10. Good words cost nothing, but are worth much.
11. No truly great man ever thought himself so.
12. Measure not thyself by thy morning shadow.
13. Courage and perseverance, these achieve victories.
14. Self is both atheist and idolator.
15. Be fit to liv and you will be fit to die.
16. He that cheats another is himself the greatest loser.
17. Oh, it is excellent to hav a giant's strength, but it is tyrannous to use it like a giant.
18. Reading, without reflection, is like eating without digesting.
19. Our doubts are traitors, and make us lose the good we oft might win, by fearing to attempt.
20. The highest learning is to be wise; the greatest wisdom is to be good.

MENTAL FREEDOM.

1. Liberty is to the collectiv body what health is to every individual body.
2. Without health no pleasure can be tasted by man; without liberty, no happiness can be enjoyed by society.
3. Reason and free inquiry are the only effectual antidotes to error.
4. No one should be required to believe merely from respect to the opinion of another.
5. Reason can, and it ought to, judge concerning all things that come within the range of the senses or the understanding.
6. Everyone who feels that he has a right to giv his opinion should remember that his auditor has an equal right to demand the reason of it.
7. Law without reason is dogmatism.
8. Whoever is afraid of submitting any question, civil or religious, to the test of free discussion is more in love with his own opinion than with truth.
9. To quarrel with one who thinks differently from ourselvs would be no less unreasonable than to be angry with him for having features unlike our own.
10. He who will not reason is a bigot; he who cannot is a fool; and he who dares not is a slave.
11. For the most part, people are born to their opinions, and never question the truth of what their family, or their country, or their party professes; they clothe their minds as they do their bodies, after the fashion in vogue; not one in a hundred ever examins his principles.
12. The right of intellectual freedom ought not to be violated to prevent any occasional inconvenience from the abusiv exercise of that right.

Here are thirty-two maxims, one for every day in the month. You might take one of the short ones for every day, and the fifth, sixth, eighth, and tenth of the second series for Sunday, because on that day you hav more time to memorize and repeat the verses. The twelfth of the "liberty maxims" is the banner motto, which grown-up Liberals should both preach and practice.

Eliza B. Burnz.

24 Clinton place, New York.

[The above maxims are all good and worthy of being memorized. As suggested by our kind friend, Mrs. Burnz, it would be well to commit them to memory, one every day, and three or four on Sunday. They will be found handy in quoting, and beneficial as a tonic and strengthener to the mind. Our friend has our thanks for her thoughtful and excellent contribution.—Ed. C. C.]

In 50 years it is computed that a man sleeps 5,500 days, walks 800 days, is ill 500 days, and spends 4,000 days in amusement. In these 50 years of his life it is estimated that he eats 77,000 pounds of bread, 22,000 pounds of meat, and 5,000 pounds of vegetables, and that he drinks 6,800 gallons of water and other liquids.

A Practical Joke.

Most squirrels keep two or more stores of food. Wood, the British naturalist, tells of a friend who found one of these reserve stores which a squirrel had provided for an exigency, and the friend, in a moment of thoughtlessness, determined to play a joke on the squirrel. He accordingly replaced the nuts by small, round stones, and carefully concealed all evidences of his visit. One cold day in winter he passed the spot, and found that the squirrel had called there a short time previously. This he knew by the fact that ten inches of snow had been scratched from the top of the hole, outside of which the stones had been cast by the disappointed animal. This struck the joker with remorse. He said: "I never felt the folly of practical joking so much in my life. Fancy the poor little fellow, nipped with cold and scanty food, but foreseeing a long winter, resolved to economize his little hoard as long as possible. Fancy him at last determined to break this—perhaps his last—magazine, and cheerily brushing away the snow, fully confident that a good meal awaited him as the reward of his cold job, and, after all, finding nothing but stones. I never felt more mean and ashamed in my life, and really would hav given a guinea to hav known that injured squirrel's address. He should hav had as fine a lot of nuts as would hav put him beyond the reach of poverty had he lived to be as old as Methuselah."

Demands of Striking.

1. A reduction of the hours of study.
2. An increase in the periods of recess.
3. Noon to begin at 11 o'clock and to extend to 1:30 or 2, according to the condition of the weather.
4. School shall let out any afternoon when there is a baseball match or a circus within fifteen miles.
5. Any scholar who wants a "reward of merit" to carry home to its parents can hav it at wholesale or cost price.
6. Ferules to be made of soft wood.
7. The old-time custom of punishing boys by compelling them to sit with the girls be immediately restored.
8. A boy who holds up his right hand and says, "Please, sir, may I go out?" shall be allowed to go, whether it be necessary or not.
9. The number of boys allowed to go and fetch a pail of water shall be increased from two to four, with proper allowance for time consumed in going and coming.
10. No boy shall be punished for offensiv words spoken in debate with another boy.
11. While believing in arbitration on general principles, we insist that two boys who hav a grudge to settle shall be allowed to fight it out between themselvs. No teacher need apply a whip on account of it.
12. A boy who tells on another shall be boycotted.
13. No boy shall be kept in after school, except at his own request, as when another boy is lying in wait to lick him.

Science Column.

A Bit of Science.

Here is a subject that has been very interesting to me, and it may be to others. If you think it of sufficient merit to lay before the young folks do so, and it may induce me to come again.

In northern Iowa and southern Minnesota are immense deposits of blue clay, and in digging wells in them it is very common to find pebbles, pockets of sand, sea shells, and bits of wood, limbs of trees, logs, and notably pieces of wood containing knots. Some of these clay deposits are from a few feet to more than one hundred feet in depth, and these different kinds of rubbish scattered all the way through them.

But how did it get there? That was always a mystery to me. But since coming to Tennessee I believe I hav solved the problem.

Standing here on the bank of the Tennessee river at the time of high water I hav noted the immense quantities of driftwood and rubbish of all kinds floating on its surface. In my mind I hav watched it floating to the gulf, becoming waterlogged on the way, and sinking, becoming covered with the sediment constantly carried down by the various rivers emptying there.

In process of time—a few hundred thousand ages—the gulf will be raised by the ever-activ forces of nature, become dry land, the habitation of men. And in seeking for water by digging wells it is no wonder that these things are found.

It seems reasonable to me that the great Northwest, the prairie region, was once the ocean bed. Those clay deposits were millions of years ago washed there by rivers emptying into the sea. The forces of nature hav raised it up perhaps a tenth of an inch in a thousand years, until it is now fertil fields, dotted with happy, prosperous homes.

And now, to-day those same activ forces are washing away its soil and substance, and depositing it in the Gulf of Mexico and the Atlantic ocean, to be again returned to the surface and again become the dwelling-place of men—beings as much in advance of our highest type of man to-day as they are ahead of the bushmen of Australia.

Poetry.

The Highway Cow.

The hue of her hide was a dusky brown,
  Her body was lean and her neck was slim;
One horn turned up, and the other down;
  She was keen of vision and long of limb;
With a Roman nose, and a short stump tail,
And ribs like the hoops on a home-made pail.

Many a mark did her body bear—
  She had been a target for all things known;
On many a scar the dusky hair
  Would grow no more where it once had grown;
Many a passionate parting shot
Had left upon her a lasting spot.

Many and many a well-aimed stone,
  Many a brickbat of goodly size,
And many a cudgel, swiftly thrown,
  Had brought the tears to her bovine eyes,
Or had bounded off from her bony back
With a noise like the sound of a rifle crack.

Many a day had she passed in the pound,
  For helping herself to the neighbors' corn;
Many a cowardly cur and hound
  Had been transfixed on her crump'ed horn;
Many a teapot and old tin-pail
Had the farmer-boys tied to her time-worn tail.

Old Deacon Gray was a pious man,
  Though sometimes tempted to be profane
When many a weary mile he ran,
  To drive her out of his growing grain.
Sharp were the pranks she used to play
To get her fill and to get away.

She knew when the deacon went to town;
  She wisely watched him when he went by;
He never passed her without a frown,
  And an evil gleam in each angry eye;
He would crack his whip in a surly way,
And drive along in his "one-horse shay."

Then at his homestead she loved to call,
  Lifting his bars with her crumpled horn;
Nimbly scaling his garden wall,
  Helping herself to his standing corn;
Eating his cabbages, one by one;
Hurrying home when her work was done.

Often the deacon homeward came,
  Humming a hymn from the house of prayer,
His hopeful heart in a tranquil frame,
  His soul as calm as the evening air,
His forehead smooth as a well-worn plow—
To find in his garden that highway cow.

His human passions were quick to rise,
  And striding forth with a savage cry,
With fury blazing from both his eyes,
  As lightnings flash in a summer sky,
Redder and redder his face would grow,
And after the creature he would go.

Over the garden, round and round,
  Breaking his pear and apple trees,
Trampling his melons into the ground,
  Overturning his hives of bees,
Leaving him angry and badly stung,
Wishing the old cow's neck was wrung.

The mosses grew on the garden wall;
  The years went by, with their work and play;
The boys of the village grew strong and tall,
  And the gray-haired farmers passed away
One by one, as the red leaves fall—
But the highway cow outlived them all.

All earthly creatures must hav their day,
  And some must hav their months and years.
Some in dying will long delay—
  There is a climax to all careers;
And the highway cow at last was slain
In running a race with a railway train.

All into pieces at once she went,
  Just like the savings banks when they fail;
Out of the world she was swiftly sent—
  Little was left but her old stump tail.
The farmers' corn-fields and gardens now
Are haunted no more by the highway cow.

A Basket of Chips.

MORAL COURAGE.

Moral courage is the mainspring of the mental chronometer. Without that there is no keeping time with the truth. Than this there is nothing so much lacking in the common character, and there is nothing that ought to be so common in character. If all would act on the adage, "Be just and fear not," there would be indeed nothing to fear, whilst the unjust are scared by their own shadows. He who dares not avow his true sentiments for fear of a boycott invites butchery by dastards who love a lie. He who will not show his colors is infidel to his comrades. Defend your flag if you want its protection.

AMERICA AHEAD.

Why should Americans, in Andover, in Yale, and in Union, so slavishly follow the lead of German exegetes? Here is a fact worth pondering: Dorner wrote to Martensen in 1870, just before starting for New York to attend the meeting of the Evangelical Alliance, that he believed that in a hundred years America would hav a theology of its own that would, perhaps, be in advance of that of Europe.

Are not church folks making too much of Mrs. Ward and her "Robert Elsmere?" Why did they overlook "John Inglesant," a beautiful book? Was it because Mr. Gladstone did not review "John Inglesant?" Renan's little romance made over again into a novel will hav its little day.—Lowell Courier.

Why should modern intellect forever dig in the dirt of ancient literature! Our colleges ought to be something better than the garbage-barrels of dead and buried generations. How university professors content themselvs to be pedantic chiffoniers with hook and bag on the dumping-ground of ancient housekeeping, mousing among the fragments of forgotten lore for the bones and claws of dinners eaten long ago? Wake up and cook a warm breakfast! Robert Elsmere doesn't amount to much; Robert Ingersoll is too tall to be overlooked, and the way he reviewed Black, Fisher, Field, Gladstone, and Talmage is a prophecy that in a hundred years theology will retire to the woods.

A POSER.

Jesus died and paid it all—
  All but a dollar and a quarter;
Sin had left a crimson stain,
  And they scrubbed it out with water.

If salvation is by faith what is the purpose of baptism? That water is an element in the system is evident from the declaration, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned."

VASSAR COLLEGE A SIN COVER.

The profits of beer hav enriched all the churches and Christian institutions that are in Poughkeepsie. John Guy Vassar died October 27th, leaving about $2,000,000. At his funeral, October 30th, Rev. Professor Kendrick, President Taylor, D.D., of Vassar, and Rev. Ransome Harvey conducted the services, eighteen young ladies from the college sang, and the directors were present in a body. Before his death he had largely endowed Vassar College, called after his brother Matthew, also a brewer of beer. He leaves $10,000 to the Poughkeepsie Baptist church; $5,000 to the Baptist church of Christ in the same place; and $500 each to the other fourteen local churches of all denominations. To six Christian institutions he leaves $1,000 each. To the Vassar home for aged men he leaves $40,000, with conditions; $25,000 without conditions. For a coal fund for poor widows $5,000 is left. To the Vassar hospital $243,000. Vassar College gets $120,000 for various purposes. An orphan asylum gets $100,000. All the rest of the property is to be given to Vassar College, the orphan asylum and the hospital, with the exception of about $1,000 in personal legacies, these institutions to hav share and share alike. Verily, charity covereth a multitude of sins.

A CUT AT CONNECTICUT.

The Hartford Courant, in exposing the wretched inefficiency of the Connecticut school system, aptly remarks that it is of far less importance that children should study interest than that they should be interested in study. Connecticut's illiteracy furnishes a charitable solution for some of her lingering exhibitions of bigotry.—Newspaper paragraph.

Inversely, Connecticut's bigotry supplies a feasible solution for her continuation of egregious illiteracy. Some of the enthusiasm in regard to missionarying the Southern states would be better utilized if rendered nearer North. Time may come when the general government will supervise public instruction, and lingering ignorance will be bounced by a higher law than those of the local school committee. Universal education must come in and come up to an efficient standard. The life of the republic depends upon the learning of the people, and the inspection and repair of the educational bulwark is most essential.

PHOTOGRAPHY AND PEDAGOGY.

The superintendents of schools in this state having failed for fifty years to gain recognition of their complaints, in the legislature, in their last report resorted to photo-engraving, and sun-printed the truth about country knowledge-boxes in a three-thousand edition, not a copy of which can be had for love or money—the Connecticut Solons refusing to furnish a duplicate edition, much as one is demanded. Respectable sums hav, however, been appropriated by the factors of statutes to establish and sustain normal and practice schools, so that in the near future the Nutmeg people may be better tutored. When Connecticut is converted from its conservatism the reign of reason will be general.

NO DUTY ON DIRT.

The great Catholic University at Washington city desired to secure the services of several eminent European professors for its divinity department, but the terms of the alien contract labor law looked like a serious obstacle. General Hepburn, the new solicitor of the treasury, was asked for an opinion in the case. He replied that the immigration of such professors under contract would be a violation of the law. If the professors will lay aside their good clothes, take steerage passage, and come into New York harbor unwashed, uncombed, tattered and torn, and get themselvs fumigated for five minutes along with the rest of the crowd below decks, they can come ashore.—New Haven News.

A very pertinent suggestion. How much is home labor protected where its importation is unlimited, and intelligence, such as it is, is taxed an entrance fee? I do not blame the unwashed who sold their soap and combs to buy steerage tickets to get here, but I wish when here they would not try to fasten on us the tyranny that doomed them at home. What work they do here leaves the way open for us to do something better.

LANSING'S LECTURES.

Rev. G. J. Lansing, of Worcester, Mass., formerly of Meriden, has just given two lectures here on "The Arts and Aims of Romanism." He showed by ancient history and by modern instances that it was and is the great red dragon inimical to both liberty and law, alien to everything good, and greedy of its own arbitrary lust and rule. He quoted from Gladstone his citations of the pseudo-Catholic character, and corroborations thereof from the mouths of Cardinal Manning and others, and showed from syllabus and encyclical that papacy was a denial of democracy and republicanism and a declaration of its own supremacy in all matters, the pope being very god, in the blasphemous vocabulary.

He became vehement in warning Americans against Jesuitical machinations in this country, and, reciting the oaths of priesthood and laity, showed that the whole craft was a conspiracy against civil government, and, in view thereof, no faithful Catholic should hav a right to citizenship. Mr. Lansing some time ago gave a course of lectures in Worcester on "Romanism and the Republic," which hav been published by W. Kellaway, in Boston, price $1.50. JOHN PRESCOTT GUILD.

THE STRUGGLE

FOR

Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

AN Esquimau sat on a chunk of ice,
In the land of the northern pole;
He cracked his heels and he whistled twice
At a sight that alarmed his soul.

For a stranger came over the fields of snow,
At a speed that was fearful, quite;
His cheeks were pallid and thin with woe,
And the frost on his beard was white.

"Oh, prithee, pause," cried the Esquimau,
"From whence do you come so fast?"
"I come from a land weary leagues below
This realm with its storm and blast.

"I come from a land in the far-off South,
And I've traveled ten thousand miles
Since last the sun like a beaming mouth
Turned loose on earth his smiles.

"I've clambered the mountains, on raging streams
Full oft I've been heaved and tossed;
I umpired a game for two baseball teams—
Alas! and the home club lost."

Here in Chicago a year is considered the fashionable limit."—Terre Haute Express.

"WORDS, WORDS, WORDS!"

An orthoepistic wail, dedicated to Alfred Ayres.

I love a miss, I do indeed,
A miss demure, with damask cheek.
I fear 'tis true I love amiss,
For what could sadder be than this?
Whene'er my love I fain would speak,
She criticises every speech
Wherein I try to paint the bliss
Her love would place within my reach.

Ah, once 'twas different! Then my prayers
She'd hear, at least, and sometimes heed,
But now, O shade of Alfred Ayres!
She only shakes her head and stares.
"It makes me nervous," she declares,
"So very ill you read."

I told her only yesternight,
That if my own I could not call her,
My wealth were hateful in my sight—
I'd waste it left, I'd waste it right,
And end my days in wretched squalor!

"Do it if you like!" she cried. (I wept.)
Then she, while I, poor wretch, grew paler,
Declared no man would she accept
Who had not learned to speak of squa-lor!

My scanty locks I wildly tore,
I vowed that no one else should hav her,
"I'll cut my throat and at your door
Will lie," I said, "my pale cadaver."

Cold was her glance with scorn and pride,
Wherein was mingled stern disfavor;
"Perhaps before you bleed," she cried,
"You'll kindly learn to say cad-a-ver!"

"O heartless, heartless she!" I said;
"My cruel, stony-souled Ophelia;
Promis at least that when I'm dead
You'll weep above my coffin's head,
And deck my grave with one camelia!"

"Short E," she said, "you stupid thing!
Why, any child in school could tell you,
The waxen flower I will not bring
To deck your tomb is called cam'el'ia."

So, when I die, unmourned, unmissed,
Inter me in some shady grove,
And carve upon my simple tomb
These melancholy words of doom:
"He died of unrequited love,
And Alfred Ayres's 'Orthœpist!'" —Helen Ten Broeck in Dramatic Mirror.

Gems of Thought.

NOR can I readily perceive the difference in principle between those ministers of the gospel who themselvs gird on the sword, as in the olden time, and those others who, unarmed and in customary suit of solemn black, lend the sanction of their presence to the martial array, or to any form or preparation for war.—Charles Sumner.

WHILE there coexist two ways of life so radically opposed as the militant and the industrial, human nature cannot become properly adapted to either.—Spencer.

IF war injures the capitalist, the manufacturer, and the trader, still more does it injure the worker.—Wallace.

IN war, as wealth dwindles somebody must suffer, and the suffering mainly falls on the poor and weak. The capitalist is mulcted of part of his wealth, but he can wait. The labor-seller is mulcted of the necessaries of life, and he and his dear ones cannot wait. The less there is to produce the less there is to distribute. Need we say which class it is that will run short? It is on you, labor-sellers of the world, that the burden of war chiefly falls. It is you who are the slayers and the slain. You form the rank and file who deal the blows and on whom the blows are dealt. To your chiefs belong the honor and the rewards. As for you, you are under contract to suffer and to cause suffering; to inflict and to endure death; to destroy instead of creating wealth; and to use every effort to suppress the fund out of which labor is paid. The war-system, pernicious to every class, is a special curse to yours.—Mongredien.

THE inadequacy of theological systems as a basis of European tranquillity having been clearly proved by the experience of many centuries, there arose in the eighteenth century a school which attempted to establish this tranquillity by a purely intellectual process—by giving intellectual pursuits and political principles a decisiv predominance over the military spirit. I allude to the French philosophers. Voltaire, after coquetting for a short time with the military spirit, threw himself cordially into the cause of peace. He employed all his amazing abilities and all his unrivaled influence to discredit war, and, with the assistance of his followers, succeeded in establishing the closest union between the intellects of France and England, and in replacing the old theological and military antipathy by the sympathy of common aspirations.—Lecky's History of Rationalism.

POVERTY is the fruitful parent of weakness, of misery, and of crime.—Buckle.

THE first requisit for man's moral improvement is the one generally last thought of—prosperity. Means of existence must be supplied before preaching and tracts can be effectiv. . . Comfort must precede education; and leisure is necessary for both moral and mental development. —Robert C. Adams in Pioneer Pith.

How pleasing must the politics be of a wretched people [the ancient Jews] who were sanguinary though not warlike, usurers without commerce, robbers without the valor necessary to preserve their rapine, continually in slavery, and continually in rebellion, sold at market by Titus and by Adrian, like the animal which they term unclean, but which is nevertheless more useful than them. Let us abandon to the declaimer Bossuet the politics of a people who were skilful only in assassination; to begin with their David, who having taken up the trade of a robber in order to become king, assassinated Uriah as soon as he became master; and the wise Solomon, who began his reign by assassinating his own brother Adonijah, at the foot of the altar. I am disgusted at the absurd pedantry which can consecrate the history of such a people to the instruction of youth.—Voltaire.

THE character of Moses, as stated in the Bible, is the most horrid that can be imagined. If those accounts be true, he was the wretch that first began and carried on wars on the score, or on the pretense, of religion; and under that mask, or that infatuation, committed the most unexampled atrocities that are to be found in the history of any nation.—Paine.

To anyone who reminds me of the boasted superiority of the Mosaic morals, I would remark that it is evident from Ex. xxxiv, that the original Decalog was devoid of the ethical provisions now found. And these commandments are strictly tribal. The command, "Thou shalt not steal," was no protection to the Egyptians; the command, "Thou shalt not kill," certainly did not apply to the Midianites.—J. M. Wheeler.

THE trouble with most people is, they bow to what is called authority; they hav a certain reverence for the old because it is old. They think a man is better for being dead, especially if he has been dead a long time.—Ingersoll.

ACCORDING to orthodox logic, God having furnished us with imperfect minds, has a right to demand a perfect result.—Ingersoll.

DECLINE OF THE PAPACY IN ITALY.

Notes and Clippings.

IT is stated that a secret consistory at Rome recently decided that the pope must leave Rome if Italy ever goes to war against a Catholic power, as he would then be a hostage besides a prisoner.

A DISPATCH reads: "Baltimore, July 1.—Kilrain is a devout Catholic, and therefore attended church to-day. He entered the church quietly, and few, if any, recognized the great pugilist as he knelt in prayerful attention."

A PHILADELPHIA Sunday-school teacher recently had a poor widow (with five children dependent on her for support) arrested for selling candies to her (the Sunday-school teacher's) pupils on Sunday, and thus diverting their pennies from the Sunday-school exchequer.

DURING the brief Franco-German war, 88,500 lives were sacrificed upon the crimson war altar. And the Emperor William's devoutly thanking God for the victory gave rise to the rather irreligious lines:

Ten thousand Frenchmen sent below,
Praise God from whom all blessings flow.

AMUSEMENT has been created in official circles at Ottawa by the report from Chicago that a newly formed Irish-American Republican Association proposes to establish a Franco-Irish republic in Canada. "The promoters of the scheme," said a leading official yesterday, "had better go to Quebec and witness the measure of fraternity between the French and Irish there before they think of putting their ideas into effect."

A DISPATCH from the City of Mexico reads: "The 16th of July will be celebrated by the Liberal party with a grand parade in honor of the late Ex-President Benito Juarez. A meeting was held in the Arben Theater last night by Liberal journalists to prepare a program, to which the public was invited. When the meeting closed a crowd surrounded the theater and took up the cries of the orators of the meeting, 'Death to the pope!' 'Death to the clergy!' The police quieted the disturbances."

CHARLES L. LANE, of Lafayette county, Ark., has become a lunatic. He was a prosperous planter, and his insanity is due to religious excitement, he having recently united with the Baptist church. Yesterday he snatched his four-months-old baby from the cradle and started toward an adjacent woods, followed by his terrified wife and a score of neighbors. The baby was recovered uninjured. Lane made several unsuccessful attempts to injure himself and friends. He was finally secured and carried to jail.

ON the question asked by the Washington paper Public Opinion, "Is religious instruction in public schools expedient?" Cardinal Gibbons says that an education that improves the mind and memory to the neglect of moral and religious training is at best but an imperfect and defectiv system. The religious and secular education of our children cannot be divorced from each other without inflicting a fatal wound upon the soul; they must go hand in hand, otherwise their education is shallow and fragmentary—a curse instead of a blessing. Rev. Dr. Thomas Hill says that religious instruction is more than expedient; it is demanded as a political necessity.

MISS LEONI STEUVENAL, of Bayonne, N. J., lost her reason a few months ago through too great application to religious studies, and was put under the charge of a professional attendant. During the absence of the nurse on June 26th Miss Steuvenal made an attempt to crucify herself. She secured a hammer and hat pins, removed her clothing, and endeavored to nail herself to the door of her room. She succeeded in driving the pins through one hand and foot before she was discovered, and though the wounds were bleeding freely she gave no sign of pain.

FRIGHTFUL shrieks were heard from an upper window of a house in West Twenty-third street, this city. A crowd surrounded the building; two policemen hastened to the place; a colored man lay in a fit on the floor, and not far from him was the woman who was doing the screaming. The people told the policeman that that building (which had been formerly of bad repute) had been hired by a mission within two weeks. At the station, the week before, a report had been made that there was a riot there. The captain made an investigation, and found that they were merely beginning their revival.

RECENTLY R. D. Johnson, a well-to-do, respectable citizen, fifty years of age, living about four miles northeast of Palouse City, W. T., killed his wife and son, about fourteen years old, and fatally shot his seven-year-old daughter, and then committed suicide. He left a note stating that he did not want to liv in this sinful world, and could not leave it without his family. So he thought he would kill them, too. All of his family were going to heaven, where Jesus was. He added that he first gave them strychnin, but could not bear the sight of their agonies, so he killed them with a revolver. The bodies were not discovered until this morning. The terrible crime is supposed to be due to temporary insanity over religion.

DISPATCH from Erie, Pa.: "The United Brethren church people are much agitated over the fight which is going on for possession of the church building between Presiding Elder Luce and Rev. O. O. Weard, pastor of the Erie congregation. When the general conference on secret society matters met the Erie church stood by the conference, and Rev. Mr. Luce, who was a bolter, was superseded by Rev. Mr. Smith. Rev. Mr. Weard appealed to the mayor, and has been enabled, with the assistance of the police force, in preventing a riot and in keeping possession of the church."

RALPH JOYCE, a Christian Brother, was arraigned before Justice Smith the other day in the Jefferson Market police court, New York, and committed to the care of the commissioners of charities for examination as to his sanity. The history of the demented Christian Brother is a sad one. Born in Ireland fifty years ago, Brother Joyce came to this country when a young man, at the invitation of his brother, who is a large dry goods dealer at Columbus, O. It was his intention to study for the Catholic priesthood. He entered the convent of the Brotherhood, but before he completed his studies his mind became impaired, and he has since gone about from one convent to another cherishing the wild delusion that he is the superior of the order. In the wildest moments of his madness he cries out, "Get thee behind me, Satan!"

The Lady of the Club.

From Belford's Magazine.

I.

The old and somewhat cynical saying, that philosophers and reformers can bear the griefs and woes of other people with a heroism and resignation worthy of their creeds, would hav fitted the case of Roland Barker only when shorn of the intentional sting of sarcasm. It is, nevertheless, true, that even his nobly gifted nature, his tender heart, and his alert brain sometimes failed to grasp the very pith and point of his own arguments.

He was a wealthy man whose sympathies were earnestly with the poor and unfortunate. He believed that he understood their sufferings, their ambitions, and their needs; and his voice and pen were no more truly on the side of charity and brotherly kindness than was his purse.

It was no unusual thing for him to attend a meeting, address a club, or take part in a memorial service, where his was the only hand unused to toil, and where he alone bore all expense, and then—after dressing himself in the most approved and faultless manner—become the guest of honor at some fashionable entertainment. Indeed, he was a leader in fashion as well as in philosophy, and at once a hero in Avenue A and on Murray Hill.

On the evening of which I am about to tell you he had addressed a club of workingmen in their little dingy hall, taking as his subject "Realities of Life." He had sought to show them that poverty and toil are not, after all, the worst that can befall a man, and that the most acute misery dwells in palaces and is robed in purple.

He spoke with the feeling of one who had himself suffered—as, indeed, he had—from the unsympathetic associations of an uncongenial marriage. He pictured, with deep feeling, the chill atmosphere of a loveless home, whose wealth and glitter and luster could never thrill and enrapture the heart as might the loving hand-clasp in the bare, chill room where sympathy and affection were the companions of poverty.

I had admired his enthusiasm as he pictured the joy of sacrifice for the sake of those we love, and I had been deeply touched by his pathos—a pathos which I knew, alas, too well, sprang from a hungry heart—whether, as now, it beat beneath a simple coat of tweed or as when, hours later, it would still be the prisoner of its mighty longing, though clothed with elegance and seated at a banquet fit for princes.

The last words fell slowly from his lips, and his eyes were dimmed, as were the eyes of all about me. His voice, so full of feeling, had hardly ceased to throb when, far back in the little hall, arose a woman, thin and worn and plainly clad, but showing traces of a beauty and refinement which had held their own and fought their way inch by inch in spite of poverty, anxiety, and tears. The chairman recognized her and asked her to the platform.

"No," she said, in a low, tremulous tone which showed at once her feeling and her culture—"no, I do not wish to take the platform; but since you ask for criticism of the kind speech we hav just listened to, it has seemed to me that I might offer one, although I am a stranger to you all."

Her voice trembled, and she held firmly to the back of a chair in front of her. The chairman signified his willingness to extend to her the privilege of the floor, and there was slight applause. She bowed and began again slowly:

"I sometimes think that it is useless to ever try to make the suffering rich and the suffering poor understand each other. I do not question that the gentleman has tasted sorrow. All good men hav. I do not question that his heart is warm and true and honest, and that he truly thinks what he has said; but—" and here her voice broke a little and her lip trembled—"but he does not know what real suffering is. He cannot. No rich man can."

There was a movement of impatience in the room, and some one said, loud enough to be heard, "If she thinks money can bring happiness she is badly left."

There was a slight ripple of laughter at this, and even the serious face of Roland Barker grew almost merry for a moment. Then the woman went on, without appearing to hav noticed the interruption:

"I do not want to seem ungracious, and heaven knows, no one could mean more kindly what I say; but he has said that money is not needed to make us happy—only love; and again he quotes that baseless old maxim, 'The love of money is the root of all evil.'" She paused, then went slowly on as if feeling her way and fearing to lose her hold upon herself: "I know it is a sad and cruel world even to the more fortunate, if they hav hearts to feel and brains to think. To the unloving or unloved there must be little worth; but they at least are spared the agony that sits where love and poverty hav shaken hands with death—" her voice broke, and there was a painful silence in the room—"where those who love are wrung and torn by all the thousand fears and apprehensions of ills that are to come to wife and child and friend. The day has passed when all this talk of poverty and love—that love makes want an easy thing to bear—that day has passed, I say, when sane men ought to think, or wise men speak, such cruel, false, and harmful words. He truly says that money without love cannot bring happiness; but that is only half the truth, for love with poverty can bring, does bring, the keenest agony that mortals ever bore."

There was a movement of dissent in the hall. She lifted her face a moment, contracted her lips, drew a long breath, and said:

"I will explain. Without the love, poverty were light enough to bear. What does it matter for one's self? It is the love that givs the awful sting to want, and makes its cruel fingers grip the throat as never vise or grappling-hook took hold, and torture with a keener zest than fiends their victims! Love and Poverty! It is the combination that devils invented to make a hell on earth."

All eyes were fastened on her white face now, and she was rushing on, her words, hot and impassioned, striking firm on every point she made.

"'Let me giv you a case. In a home where comfort is—or wealth—a mother sits, watching by night and day the awful hand of Death reach nearer, closer to her precious babe, and nothing that skill or science can suggest will stay the hand or heal the aching heart; and yet there is comfort in the thought that all was done that love and wealth and skill could do, and that it was Nature's way. But take from her the comfort of that thought. She watches with the same poor, breaking heart, but with the knowledge, now, to keep her company, that science might, ah! could, push back the end, could even cure her babe if but the means to pay for skill and change and wholesome food and air were hers. Is that no added pang? Is poverty no curse to her?—a curse the deeper for her depth of love? The rich know naught of this. It givs to life its wildest agony, to love its deepest hurt."

She paused. There was a slight stir as if some one had thought to offer applause, and then the silence fell again, and she began anew, with shining eyes and cheeks aflame. She swayed a little as she spoke, and clutched the chair as for support. Her voice grew hoarse, and trembled, and she fixed her gaze upon a vacant chair:

"But let me tell you of another case. A stone's-throw from this hall, where pretty things are said week after week—and kindly meant, I know—of poverty and love—of the blessedness of these—there is a living illustration, worth more than all the theories ever spun, to tell you what 'realities of life' must be where love is great and poverty holds sway. Picture, with me, the torture and despair of a refined and cultured woman who watches hour by hour the long months through, and sees the creeping feet of mental wreck and physical decay, and knows the mortal need of care and calm for him who is the whole of life to her, and for the want of that which others waste and hold as dross he must work on and on, hastening each day the end he does not see, which shall deprive him of all of life except the power for ill. . . . She will be worse than widowed and alone, for ever by her side sits Want, for him, tearing at every cord of heart and soul—not for herself—but for that dearer one, wrecked in the prime of life and left a clod endowed only with strength for cruel wrong, whose hand would sheathe a knife in her dear heart and laugh with maniac glee at his mad deeds. She saw the end. She knew long months ago what was to be, if he must toil and strain his nerve and brain for need of that which goes from knave to knave, and hoards itself within cathedral walls, where wise men meet to teach the poor contentment with their lot! She knew he must not know; the knowledge of the shadow must be kept from his dear brain until the very end, by smiles, and cheer, and merry jest from her. Who dare tell her that riches are a curse? and prate of 'dross' and call on heaven to witness that its loss is only gain of joy and harbinger of higher, holier things? Who dare call her as witness for the bliss of poverty with love?"

She slowly raised her hand, and, with a quick-drawn breath, pressed it against her side, and with her eyes still fastened on the vacant chair, and tears upon her cheeks, falling unchecked upon her heaving bosom, she held each listener silent and intent on every word she spoke. The time allotted anyone was long since overrun; but no one thought of that, and she went on:

"'With love!' Ah, there is where the iron can burn and scar and open every wound afresh each day, make poverty a curse, a blight, a scourge, a vulture, iron-beaked, with claws of burning steel, that leave no nerve untouched, no drop of blood unshed.

"'With love!' 'Tis there the hand of Poverty can deal the deadliest blows, and show, as nowhere else on earth, the value of that slandered, hoarded thing called wealth."

There blazed into her face a fierce, indignant light, her voice swelled out and struck upon the ear like fire-bells in the dead of night.

"'The root of evil!'—'poverty with love!' Hypocrisy, in purple velvet robed, behind stained glass, with strains of music falling on its ears, with table spread in banquet-hall below, bethought itself to argue thus to those itself had robbed; while, thoughtless of its meaning and its birth, the echo of its lying, treacherous words comes from the pallid lips of many a wretch whose life has been a failure and an agony because of that which he himself extols. A lie once born contains a thousand lives, and holds at bay the struggling, feeble truth, if but that lie be fathered by a priest and mothered by a throne—as this one was! 'The root of evil' is the spring of joy. Decry it those who will. And those who do not love, perchance, may laugh at all its need can mean; but to the loving, suffering poor bring no more cant, and cease to voice the hollow words of ignorance and hypocrisy. It is too cruel, and its deadly breath has long enough polluted sympathy and frozen up the springs of healthy thought, while sheathing venomed fangs in breaking hearts. Recast your heartless creeds! Your theories for the poor are built on these."

She sank back into her chair white and exhausted.

There was a wild burst of applause. A part of the audience, with that ear for sound and that lack of sense to be found in all such gatherings, had forgotten that it was not listening to a burst of eloquence which had been duly written out and committed to memory for the occasion.

But Roland Barker sprang to his feet, held both his hands up, to command silence, and said, in a scarcely audible voice, as he trembled from head to foot: "Hush, hush! She has told the truth! She has told the awful truth! I never saw it all before. Heaven help you to bear it. It seems to me I can not!"

Several were pale and weeping. I turned to speak to the woman who had changed an evening's entertainment into a tragic scene; but she had slipped out during the excitement. I took Barker's arm and we walked toward the avenue together. Neither of us spoke until we reached Madison square. Here the poor fellow sank into a seat and pulled me down beside him.

"Don't talk to me of theories after that," he said. "Great God! I am more dead than alive. I feel fifty years older than when I went to that little hall to teach those people how to liv by my fine philosophy, and I truly thought that I had tasted sorrow and found the key to resignation. Ye gods!"

"Perhaps you hav," I said.

"Yes, yes," he replied, impatiently; "but suppose I had to face life day by day, hour by hour, as that woman pictured it—and she was a lady with as keen a sense of pain as I—what do you suppose my philosophy would do for me then? Do you think I could endure it? And I went there to teach those people how to suffer and be strong!"

"Look here, Barker," I said, "you'd better go home now and go to bed. You are cold and tired, and this won't help matters any."

"What will?" he asked.

I made no reply. When we reached his door he asked again:

"What will?"

I shook my head and left him standing in the brilliant hall of his beautiful home, dazed and puzzled and alone.

II.

The next time I met Roland Barker he grasped my hand and said excitedly: "I hav found that woman! What she said is all true. My God! what is to be done? I feel like a strong man tied hand and foot, while devilish vultures feed on the flesh of living babes before my eyes!"

"Stop, Barker," I said; "stop, and go away for a while, or you will go mad. What hav you been doing? Look at your hands; they tremble like the hands of a palsied man; and your face; why, Barker, your face is haggard and set, and your hair is actually turning gray! What in the name of all that's holy hav you been doing?"

"Nothing, absolutely nothing!" he exclaimed. "That is the trouble! What can I do? I tell you something is wrong, Gordon, something is desperately wrong in this world. Look at that pile of stone over there: millions of dollars are built into that. It is opened once each week, aired, cleaned, and put in order for a fashionable audience dressed in silk and broadcloth. They call it a church, but it is simply a popular club house, which, unlike other club houses, hasn't the grace to pay its own taxes. They use that club house, let us say, three hours in all, each week, for what? To listen to elaborate music and fine-spun theories about another world. They are asked to, and they giv money to send these same theories to nations far away, who—to put it mildly—are quite as well off without them. Then that house is closed for a week, and those who sat there really believe that they hav done what is right by their fellow-men! Their natural consciences, their sense of right and justice, hav been given an anesthetic. 'The poor ye hav with you always,' they are taught to believe, is not only true, but right. I tell you, Gordon, it is all perfectly damnable, and it seems to me I cannot bear it when I remember that woman."

"She is only one of a great many," I suggested.

Roland Barker groaned: "My God! that is the trouble—so many that the thing seems hopeless. And to think that on every one of even these poor souls is laid another burden that that stone spire may go untaxed!"

"Barker," I said, laying my hand on his arm, "tell me what has forced all this upon you with such a terrible weight just now."

"Not here, not now," he said. "I hav written it down just as she told it to me—you know I learned stenography when I began taking an interest in public meetings. Well, I've just been copying these notes out. They are in my pocket," he said, laying his hand on his breast. "They seem to burn my very soul. I would not dare to trust myself to read them to you here. Come home with me."

When we were seated in his magnificent library, he glanced about him, and with a wave of his hand said, with infinit satire, "You will notice the striking appropriateness of the surroundings and the subject."

"No doubt," I said. "I hav often noticed that before, especially the last time I heard a sermon preached to three of the Vanderbilts, two Astors, five other millionaires, and about sixty more consistent Christians, all of whom were wealthy. The subject was Christ's advice to the rich young man, 'Sell all thou hast and giv to the poor.' But never mind; go on; the day has passed when deed and creed are supposed to hold the slightest relation to each other; and what is a $20,000 salary for if not to buy sufficient ability to explain it all sweetly away and administer, at the same time, an anesthetic to the natural consciences of men?"

I settled myself in a large Turkish chair on one side of the splendidly carved table; he stood on the other side sorting a manuscript. Presently he began reading it. "'When I married Frank Melville he was strong and grand and brave; a truer man never lived. He had been educated for the law. His practice was small, but we were able to liv very well on what he made, and the prospect for the future was bright. We loved each other—but, ah! there are no words to tell that. We worshiped each other as only two who hav been happily mated can ever understand. We lived up to his salary. Perhaps you will say that was not wise. We thought it was. A good appearance, a fairly good appearance at least, was all that we could make, and to hold his own in his profession, that was necessary. You know how that is. A shabby-looking man soon loses his hold on paying clients. Of course he would not dress well and allow me to be ill-clad. He—he loved me. We were never able to lay by anything; but we were young and strong and hopeful—and we loved each other.'" Barker's voice trembled. He looked at me a moment and then said very low, "If you could hav seen her poor, tired, beautiful eyes when she said that."

"I can imagin how she looked," I said. "She had a face one remembers."

After a little he went on: "'We had both been brought up to liv well. Our friends were people of culture, and we—it will sound strange to you for me to say that our love and devotion were the admiration and talk of all of them.

"'By and by I was taken ill. My husband could not bear to think of me as at home alone, suffering. He stayed with me a great deal. I did not know that he was neglecting his business; I think he did not realize it then; he thought he could make it all up; he was strong and—he loved me. At last the doctors told him that I should die if he did not take me away; I ought to hav an ocean voyage. It almost killed him that he could not giv me that. We had not the money. He took me away a little while where I could breathe the salt air, and the good it did me made his heart only the sadder when he saw that it was true that all I needed was an ocean voyage. The climate of his home was slowly killing me. We bore it as long as we dared, and I got so weak that he almost went mad. Then we moved here, where my health was good. But it was a terrible task to get business; there were so many others like him, all fighting, as if for life, for money enough to liv on from day to day. The strain was too much for him, and just as he began to gain a footing he fell ill, and—and if we had had money enough for him to take a rest then, and hav proper care, good doctors, and be relieved from immediate anxiety, he would hav gotten well, with my care—I loved him so! But as it was——' Shall I show you the end?" Barker stopped, he was trembling violently, his eyes were full of tears. I waited. Presently he said, huskily: "Shall I tell you, Gordon, what I saw? I hav not gott en over it yet. She laid her fingers on her lips and motioned me to follow. The room where we had been was poor and bare. She took a key from her bosom, opened a door, and went in. I followed. Sitting in the only comfortable chair—which had been handsome once—was a magnificent-looking man, so far as mere physical proportions can make one that.

"'Darling,' she said tenderly, as if talking to a little child. 'Darling, I hav brought you a present. Are you glad?'

"She handed him a withered rose that I had carelessly dropped as I went in.

"He arose, bowed to me when she presented me, waved me to his chair, took the flower, looked at her with infinit love, and said, 'To-morrow, little wife; wait till to-morrow.'

"Then he sat down, evidently unconscious of my presence, and gazed steadily at her for a moment, seeming to forget all else and to struggle with some thought that constantly eluded him. She patted his hand as if he were a child, smiling through her heart-break all the while, kissed him, and motioned me to precede her from the room.

"When she came out she locked the door carefully behind her, sank into a chair, covered her face with her hands, and sobbed as if her heart would break. After a while she said: 'A little money would hav saved him, and now it is too late, too late. Sometimes he is violent, sometimes like that. The doctors say the end is not far off, and that any moment he may kill me, and afterward awake to know it! It is all the result of poverty with love!' she said. Then, passionately: 'If I did not love him so I could bear it, but I cannot, I cannot! And how will he bear it if he ever harms me—and I not there to help him?'"

Barker stepped to the window to hide his emotion. Presently he said, in a voice that trembled: "If she did not love him so she could let him go to some—asylum; but she knows the end is sure, and not far off, and that the gleams of light he has are when he sees her face. She has parted with everything that made life attractiv to keep food and warmth for him. She is simply existing now from day to day—one constant agony of soul and sense—waiting for the end. She allowed me to take a doctor to see him; I would hav come for you, but you were out of town. He only confirmed what others had told her a year ago. He advised her to hav him put in a safe place before he did some violence; but she refused, and made us promis not to interfere. She said he would be able to harm no one but her, if he became violent at the last, and she was ready for that. It was easier far to liv that way and wait for that each day than to hav him taken away where he would be unhappy and perhaps ill-treated. He needed her care and love beside him every hour, and she—she needed nothing."

Here Barker flung himself into a chair and let his head fall on his folded arms on the table.

"That is the way love makes poverty easy to bear," he said, bitterly, after a time, and his trembling hands clinched tight together.

"Did you giv her any money?" I asked.

He groaned. "Yes, yes, I—that is, I left some on the table under her sewing. She isn't the kind of woman one can offer charity. She——"

"No," I said, "she isn't, and besides, for the pain that tortures her it is too late now for money to help. Only it may relieve her somewhat to feel sure that she can get what he needs to eat and wear and to keep him warm and allow her to be free from the necessity of outside work. I am glad you left the money. But—but—Barker, do you think she will use it, coming that way and from a stranger?"

He looked up forlornly. "No, I don't," he said; "and yet she may. I will hope so; but if she does, what then? The terrible question will still remain just where it was. That is no way to solve it; we can't bail out the ocean with a thimble. And what an infamous imposition all this talk is of 'resignation' to such as she; for her terrible calm, as she talked to me, had no hint of resignation in it. She is simply, calmly, quietly desperate now—and she is one of many." He groaned aloud.

"Will you take me there the next time you go?" I asked.

"She said I must not come back; she could not be an object of curiosity—nor allow him to be. She said that she allowed me to come this time because on the night we first saw her she had stepped into that little hall to keep herself from freezing in her thin clothes as she was making her way home, and she saw that I was in earnest in what I said, and she stayed to listen——" His voice broke again.

Just then the drapery was drawn back, and his wife, superbly robed, swept in, bringing a bevy of girls.

"Oh, Mr. Barker," said one, gayly, "you don't know what you missed to-night by deserting our theater party; it was all so real—love in rags, you know, and all that sort of thing; only I really don't like to see quite so much attention paid to the 'Suffering poor,' with a big S, and the lower classes generally. I think the stage can do far better than that, don't you? But it is the new fad, I suppose, and after all I fancy it doesn't do much harm, only as it makes that sort of people more insufferably obtrusiv about putting their ill-clad, bad-smelling woes before the rest of us. What a beautiful vase this is, Mrs. Barker! May I take it to the light?"

"Certainly, my dear," laughed Mrs. Barker; "and I agree with you, as usual. I think it is an exquisit vase—and that the stage is becoming demoralized. It is pandering to the low taste for representations of low life. I confess I don't like it. That sort of people do not hav the feelings to be hurt—the fine sensibilities and emotions attributed to them. Those grow up in refined and delicate surroundings. That is what I often tell Roland when he insists upon making himself unhappy over some new 'case' of destitution. I tell him to send them five dollars by mail and not to worry himself, and I won't allow him to worry me with his Christie street emotions."

Barker winced, and I excused myself and withdrew, speculating on certain phases of delicacy of feeling and fine sensibility.

III.

I did not see Barker again for nearly three weeks, when one night my bell was rung with unusual violence, and I heard an excited voice in my hall. "Be quick, John; hurry," it said, "and tell the doctor I must see him at once. Tell him it is Roland Barker."

John had evidently demurred at calling me at so late an hour.

"All right, Barker; I'll be down in a moment," I called from above. "No, come up. You can tell me what is the matter while I dress. Is it for yourself? There, go in that side room, I can hear you, and I'll be dressed in a moment."

"Hurry, hurry," he said, excitedly, "I'll tell you on the way. I hav my carriage. Don't wait to order yours, only hurry, hurry, hurry."

Once in the carrirge, I said: "Barker, you are going to use yourself up, this way. You can't keep this sort of thing up much longer. You'd better go abroad."

"Drive faster," he called, to the man on top. Then to me, "If you are not the first doctor there, there will be a dreadful scene. They will most likely arrest her for murder."

"Whom?" said I. "You hav told me nothing, and how can I prevent that if a murder has been committed?"

"By giving her a regular death certificate," said he, coolly, "saying that you attended the case, and that it was a natural death. I depend upon you, Gordon; it would be simply infamous to make her suffer any more. I cannot help her now, but you can—you must. No one will know the truth but us, and afterward we can help her—to forget. She is not an old woman; there may be something in life for her yet."

"Is it the Lady of the Club?" I asked. We had always called her that. "What has she done?"

"Yes," he said, "it is the 'Lady of the Club,' and she has poisoned her husband."

"Good God!" exclaimed I; "and you want me to giv her a regular death certificate and say I attended the case?"

"You must," he said; "it would be infamous not to. She could not bear it any longer. She found herself breaking down, and she would not leave him alive without her care and love. He had become almost helpless, except when short violent spells came on. These left him exhausted. He almost killed her in the last one. Her terror was that he would do so and then regain his reason—that he would know it afterward and perhaps be dragged through the courts. She had been working in a chemist's office, it seems, when she was able to do anything. She took some aconitine, and to-night she put everything in perfect order, gave him the best supper she could, got him to bed, and then gave him that. She sent for me and told me as calmly as—God! it was the calm of absolute desperation. She sat there when I went in, holding his poor dead hand and kissing it reverently. She laid it down and told me what I tell you. There was not a tear, a moan, a sigh. She said: 'Here is the money you left—all except what I paid for his supper to-night. We had gotten down to that before I had the chance to steal the poison or the courage to giv it to him. I had not meant to use any of the money; the rest is here. I would like it used—if you are willing—to bury him decently, not in the Potter's Field, and I would like—if you will take the trouble—to hav it done absolutely privately. We hav borne enough. I cannot bear for even his ashes to be subjected to any further humiliation.'"

Roland Barker paused to command himself. "Of course I promised her," he went on after a time. "She does not realize that she may be arrested and hav his poor body desecrated to find the cause of death. That would make her insane—even if——. Drive faster!" he called out again to the man outside. When we reached the house he said: "Be prepared to see her perfectly calm. It is frightful to witness, and I tremble for the result later on."

When we knocked on her door there was no response. I pushed it open and entered first. The room was empty. We went to the inner door and rapped gently, then louder. There was no sound. Barker opened the door, and then stepped quickly back and closed it. "She is kneeling there by his bed," he said, "write the certificate here and giv it to me. Then I will bring an undertaker and—we can attend to everything else. I did want you to see her. I think you should giv her something to make her sleep. That forced calm will make her lose her mind. She is so shattered you would not recognize her."

"Stay here, Barker," I said; "I want to see her alone for a moment. I will tell her who I am and that you brought me—if I need to."

He eyed me sharply, but I stepped hastily into the inner room. I touched the shoulder and then the forehead of the kneeling form. It did not move. "Just as I expected," I muttered, and lifting the lifeless form in my arms I laid it gently beside the body of her husband. In one hand she held the vial from which she had taken the last drop of the deadly drug, and clasped in the other she had held her husband's fingers. She had been dead but a few moments, and both she and her husband were robed for the grave.

When I returned to the other room I found Barker with a note in his hand, and a shocked and horrified look on his face. He glanced up at me through his tears.

"We were too late," he said. "She left this note for me. I found it here on the table. She meant to do it all along, and that is why she was so calm and had no fears for herself."

"I thought so when you told me what she had done," said I.

"Did you? I did not for a moment, or I would hav stayed and tried to reason her out of it."

"It is best as it is," said I, "and you could not hav reasoned her out of it. It was inevitable—after the rest. Take this certificate, too; you will need both."

When all was safely over, as we drove home from the new graves two days later, Barker said: "Is this the solution?"

I did not reply.

Presently he said: "To the dead, who cannot suffer, we can be kind and shield them even from themselvs. Is there no way to help the living? A few hundred dollars, two short years ago, would hav saved all this, and there was no way for her to get it. She knew it all then, and there was no help!"

"Why did she not, in such a case as that, push back her pride and go to some one? There must be thousands who would hav gladly responded to such a call as that," I said.

He buried his face in his hands for a moment and shuddered. At last he said: "She did—she went to three good men, men who had known, been friendly with, admired her and her husband. Two of them are worth their millions, the other one is rich. She only asked to borrow, and promised to repay it herself if she had to liv and work after he were dead to do it!"

He paused.

"You do not mean to tell me that they refused—and they old friends and rich?" I asked, amazed.

"I mean to say just this, they one and all made some excuse; they did not let her hav it."

"She told them what the doctors said, and of her fears?"

"She did," he answered, sadly.

"And yet you say they are good men!" I exclaimed, indignantly.

"Good, benevolent, charitable, every one of them," he answered.

"Were you one of them, Barker?" I asked, after a moment's pause.

"Thank God, no!" he replied. "But perhaps in some other case I hav done the same, if I only knew the whole story. Those men do not know this last, you must remember."

"And the worst of it is, we dare not tell them," said I, as we parted.

"No, we dare not," he replied, and left me standing with the copy of the burial certificate in my hand.

"Natural causes," I said to myself, looking at it. "Died of natural causes—the brutality and selfishness of man—and poverty with love. Natural causes! Yes." And I closed my office door and turned out the light. HELEN H. GARDENER.

Jesus the Sabbath-Breaker.

At the present time there appears upon our political horizon a small black cloud, which, if it is allowed to enlarge itself, will tend to develop and extend itself throughout the country—I mean the Blair Sunday bill.

Senator Blair, with the aid of a few other equally intolerant pietists, is making the greatest exertions to induce the government to pass a law enforcing absolute inaction on Sunday, or what is commonly called the "Sabbath day," and urge upon their flocks the necessity of looking after their "souls' health," by atoning on the seventh day for the sins which they hav committed during the six days of the week. THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Freethought journals that are doing such good service to the cause of progress, hav already taken up the cudgels upon this subject; but now I propose to show that in the early days of Christianity absolute repose on Sunday was not thought necessary, which may be gathered from the works of the early fathers; and that according to the accounts of the life of Christ, as given in these four epistles called the gospels, there is nowhere to be found a recommendation to abstain from work on the seventh day, while on the other hand, if those legendary accounts are worthy of note, we may safely draw the inference that Jesus himself was a Sabbath-breaker. And as these strait-laced Christians are endeavoring by the law of the land, or rather the law of public opinion, to enforce a painfully superstitious and Judaical observance of the day called Sunday, we will consider what the founder of the Christian religion thought of the Sabbatical institution, and how he himself behaved with regard to it.

In considering this subject I wish the reader to bear in mind the severity of the Judaical Sabbath, built upon an idle tradition which modern science has proved to be a gross and pueril lie, though it had all the force of a truth in the days of the early Jews. With them the Sabbath was a day of total inaction; the servant, the cattle, and the stranger were to observe it. No servant could be required to perform any domestic office, no horse could be ridden, no meal could be cooked, no fire could be kindled; it was indeed a day of desolation and pious indolence. We know from one memorable instance the terrible penalty of disregarding the commands of the imperious Moses upon this subject.

Now, the mind of Jesus naturally rebelled against this formalistic tyranny, and so he taught a new doctin concerning the Sabbath. The first place in the New Testament where the subject is, is the twelfth chapter of Matthew. There we are told that the disciples of Jesus, walking through a cornfield, plucked the ripe ears of corn and ate them to satisfy their hunger. Think of this, you clerical hypocrits, who would send a man to jail for stealing a turnip from a roadside field. Think of it. If it was morally right for the apostles to pluck the corn to satisfy their hunger, then it is just as right for the poor tramp to steal a turnip to satisfy his hunger. But only let the poor tramp who has not broken his fast follow the example of the associates of Jesus, you will, if he is caught, immediately put him in jail. Yet none of you denounce the conduct of Christ's followers from your pulpits.

When the Pharisees complained to Jesus that his followers were acting unlawfully, he earnestly defended their conduct, saying: "The son of man is lord even of the Sabbath." Certainly in his capacity as a man he was, for every earnest, well-doing man is master of his own time, and therefore he consecrates it by industry. Yet our Blairs and Wanamakers and Shepards would (if they are allowed), desecrate it by a long and enforced tedious rest, instead of making it a day of pleasant change, or day subordinated to man, and "not man to it." But we are told that this is the Lord's day, and therefore we hav no right to it. But I answer that, if any day is the Lord's, then all days are equally his, and therefore man has the right to choose his own day of rest, and not to be compelled to rest upon one certain day in order to satisfy the whims of a few religious fanatics, who happen to fill important public offices not for the actual worth of the men but for services rendered to the party.

In the same chapter to which I hav referred, it is recorded that Jesus healed on the Sabbath day a man whose hand was withered. This deed he also defended against the Pharisees, saying: "It is lawful to do well on the Sabbath day." Now, every true Liberal would imitate that miracle. We want to heal the withered on the Sunday, to expand the withered mind, to sustain the withered form of age, to exercise and strengthen the stunted limbs of childhood. We want to make the laborer feel that this so-called Sabbath is his own day, and that no one, whether a pope or a king, has a right to dictate to him how he shall use it. We want to wean him from drunkenness, indolence, and dirt, and teach him to devote his Sunday to fresh air, rational recreation, and pleasing instruction.

Christ expressed his opinion of the Pharisees by saying: "Ye make clean the outside of the cup and the platter, but your inward part is full of ravening and wickedness" (Luke xi, 5, 39). And we may truly read "Sabbatarian" for "Pharisee," for the Sabbatarians make clean the outside of the cup, they would hav everything externally decorous, but the career of those belonging to religious society shows that their private lives are not correspondingly wholesome. The Sabbatarians would clean the outside with a hand of iron, they would silence the bands which play in our parks on Sunday, and if they could they would even silence the birds of the air, and the innocent laughter of childhood; they would cause the trains to become motionless, the steamboats on our rivers would be stopped, and the sallow, haggard workman, instead of being allowed to enjoy the grandeur of nature, would be compelled to pray or sleep in a church or chapel, afterward to find the side-door of a liquor saloon where he could drink himself to stupefaction. So the outside be fair, what care these hypocritical pietists for the poor, spirit-broken man? Better, they think, he should be wretched in this vale of tears, to insure him a greater chance of heaven. The next time we hear of Jesus breaking the Sabbath is when he is said to hav healed a blind man on that day; read ninth chapter of John. Again, in this event, the Pharisees demurred to the performance of a generous deed on the sacred day. "This man," they said, "is not of God, because he keepeth not the Sabbath day." And that is exactly what the Sabbatarians say of the Liberals, and if Jesus himself had lived in these days, they would indignantly disown him, while the sterner saints would probably try to get him condemned as an idler, blasphemer, and Sabbath-breaker.

Luke in his thirteenth chapter and fourteenth verse records that Jesus was teaching in one of the synagogs on the Sabbath, when he saw a poor woman whose back had been bent like a bow for a number of years. And being actuated by a compassionate temper, he at once healed her. And again the pious folks were offended, for, unlike Thomas Paine, their religion was not to do good, but consisted of a strict observance of days and ceremonies. Jesus, however, sternly rebuked them for their want of common humanity, and "they were ashamed," as well they might be.

The last recorded instance of Sabbath-breaking upon the part of Christ was his going to a dinner party on that day. So we see that Christ was not averse to a well-conducted sociality. We are told that he went to the house of one of the chief Pharisees to eat bread on the Sabbath. This is a matter of no great surprise, because Jesus was a poor man, and did not always get a dinner, and was no doubt glad enough to accept the invitation. But while there he saw a man afflicted with the dropsy and he healed him (Luke xiv). On seeing the man with the dropsy, Christ demanded of the Pharisee and his friends: "Is it lawful to heal on the Sabbath day?" What did they say? Did they say, It is right to do good at any time? Decidedly not. For we are told that "they held their peace." Well, even that is a virtue that their representativs to-day do not possess. McHowl, O'Grabem, and Father Blazes will never hold their peace while they hav a pulpit to rave in and a tongue to denounce their fellow-creatures with. We only ask them to hold their peace. We do not desire them to do good, but only to abstain from doing harm. We do not ask them by benevolence to bless the world, but to refrain from cursing it. We merely desire them not to make our "little pleasures less," and to leave off striving to convert this world into a hell and threatening us with another elsewhere.

"They held their peace," but Christ healed the man, even though it was the Sabbath, and then justified himself, saying, "Which of you shall hav an ass or an ox fallen into a pit, and will not straightway pull him out on the Sabbath day?" Yes, which of them would not? Why, they were Jews, and every one of them would. I do not censure them, for it would only hav been proper to do so, but we must bear in mind that humane actions are in just and direct antagonism to religious duties. The more religion, the less humanity; the less religion, the more of all that makes a man's character noble and enduring.

Clearly enough, then, Christ cared very little for the Sabbath, and infinitly less for the Sabbatarians of his day. The latter were the objects of his disgust, his hatred, and his curses; and that he could hate bitterly and curse volubly will be evident to anyone who will read the twenty-third chapter of Matthew. If, then, Christ cared so little for the Sabbath day, how inconsistent it is for his followers in this age to enforce a strict observance of it by law, when the founder of the religion in which they profess to believe so disregarded it! O for the omnipotent hand that could hurl into everlasting oblivion the clouds of superstitious darkness that reign rampant on the earth, that vitiate the moral nature, and bewilder the intellect of man! Oh, would that orthodoxy would explode itself and become distributed into illimitable space like a summer cloud! Then how serene and how happy would the intellectual horizon of society become, if once it were freed from the fallacies of screaming Hebrew prophets and modern Sunday sermons!

If these infamous Sunday measures are ever allowed to become a law, the beauties of nature will be entirely shut out from the gaze of man, and the terrible silence in our streets and our parks, broken only by the monotonous clang of a church bell, will reveal to him the fact that this is "Sunday." Sunday to be spent not in healthful recreation, but among priests, Bibles, church rites, prayers, and dogmas, and a host of evil consequences produced thereby, and that, too, at the dictation of a few religio-political demagogs.

But the question rests not with them, but with the people themselvs. It is for them to say whether they shall be American citizens for six days in the week, and slaves of the pope on the seventh. We must teach these Blairites that the progress of this nation cannot stop for one day even to suit them. Days of enforced idleness are injurious both to body and mind. Nature ever abhors indolence and punishes it. Let it not be thought that I disparage the observance of Sunday, only let it be conducted in a wholesome and rational manner. It should be a day of rest and combined recreation, when the mind is pleasantly diverted from the toils of the week; it should be the sober carnival of labor, and all who labor hav a right to enjoy it temperately and wisely. They hav a right to enjoy it without interruption or remonstrance from government or clergy, and it is certain that they will so enjoy it while they hold the power in their hands. JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH.

Devotional Exercises in Public Schools.

In introducing this subject the object is not to ridicule nor to engender strife, discord, or enmity against public customs, but rather to compose and reconcile the diversity of public opinion, of customs—to weigh in the balance of justice our right and privileges to the noblest institution of a free country, the base and foundation of the grandest system of civilization and liberty, the public school, and unite the extremes in one compact for the good of all alike—to harmonize the destructiv elements of dissension caused by either a party or a sect, which oftentimes bring ruinous obstacles to the diffusion of knowledge.

Our public school system was not intended in part, but wholly, to be a secular institution to educate our progeny and prepare them for the various paths of life; to cultivate and inculcate facts, and not fiction, thereby making useful, intelligent, and moral citizens, guided by the light of science, and by its attraction to engender desires for further researches into the great laboratory of nature, without fear or awe. But when the tender mind is imbued with devotional awe or affrighted reverence, it becomes shattered, lost, and bewildered in fear.

In the first seven or eight years of a child's life it will probably be settled whether he is to be swayed by superstition or intelligence; whether he is to liv terrorized by fear or buoyed up by hope and courage. Whoever sends a child into life, permanently anticipating evil, suspicious of everyone in authority, with a disposition to lord it over inferiors by way of making things even, does the child, his associates, and society a wrong so great that no counter-charity can cover it.—Boston Journal of Education.

Customs come and go, liv and die, and oftentimes leave a mound to mark their resting-place on the broad plain of civilization, and many are buried in the nineteenth century. The custom of slavery that demoralized our freedom, was not subdued or uprooted until steeped in human gore. Mental slavery is the worst form of serfdom; as yet we know not what ransom will be necessary to secure our emancipation. The ecclesiastics of England say that the Welsh peasant is becoming too educated to be subservient to their power.

Public schools are supported alike by the Jew and gentile, the orthodox and heterodox, regardless of race or color; all are taxed for their support, therefore entitled to their untrammeled benefits, aside from customs created by creeds. School laws prohibit sectarianism to be taught, but do permit the Bible to be read.

Archbishop Walsh, of Dublin, recently refused to take the oath upon a Protestant Testament, on the grounds that he did not believe in it, and his testimony was taken unsworn, but still, in the boasted free America, our attention has recently been called to a public school teacher who insisted on a Catholic child conforming to her ritual, the reading of the Protestant Bible, and the repeating of the Lord's Prayer, as the introduction to the day's work. Has not the Catholic child in the American public schools rights in this direction as well as the Catholic bishop in a Dublin court?—Unity.

Should any pupil refuse obedience to these customary mandates, ostracism sets in. As a question of right, the state has no right to establish a religion; still it does permit customs in public places, and establishes them as law, whether agreeable or disagreeable, regardless of the Constitution. Whether it is at the instance of the board of directors or at the choice of the teachers that these customary exercises are permitted or demanded, it matters not. If at the instance of directors, religious qualification of teachers would be essential; if left to the choice of teachers, they may be devotional and they may not be—only in name. Thus how anxious is each sect to hav control of school boards, so it may employ teachers of its creed to gain its selfish ends—draw the tender mind to Sunday-schools and church to upbuild its particular cause at public expense and detriment!

J. E. Remsburg in "Bible Morals," says, "I hav no objection to the cuckoos' propagating their young, but I do object to their laying their eggs in the secular nest, the public school." Hav school boards or teachers a right to inculcate Christian doctrin to the Jew, or myths and miracles to the Liberal, or to read the Protestant Bible to the Catholic? The answer is obvious. And therefore they hav no right to sway the youthful mind, whether it be of the Jew, gentile, or heterodox stock. The custom of Bible-reading in school givs privilege to the Catholics to inculcate their doctrin when in the majority, or givs justifiable cause for them to patronize the parochial and destroy the public school. These customary exercises call in the Bible to the public school. Which of the several versions shall be adopted? This is another perplexing question. Over it the sects will fight. We shall be injured by their fighting; otherwise we should not care, as either will serve to frighten with awe and intimidate, to teach the art of theurgy and all that is subversiv of the regular laws and system of nature.

The danger of such customs is yet ahead. The deathblow at the fundamental principles of liberty and freedom will presently be dealt through the public school—to subdue the infant in the cradle of education. The ecclesiastic will place it under the supervision of priest or prelate of a predominating sect elected by votaries.

We repeat that such usurpation as Bible-reading in school leads to the upbuilding of parochial schools, sectarian seminaries, and colleges that draw from the public schools.

Could the sects but unite, the division of the spoils would be accomplished by legislation.

It is the established axiom of all popular institutions that religious tenets and party politics tend to destroy with jealous animosity popular government's most vital instrument, the public school.

Giordano Bruno.

Translated from the Voce del Popolo, San Francisco.

The animation which reigned in Rome to-day, from the earliest hour, is indescribable. In the Via Nazionale, then in the Terminal places, and in the vicinity of the stations the crowd was simply enormous. The cortege began to form in the Place of Termini. At nine precisely it began to move and wind through the Via Nazionale (National street) into the Square of Venice, and the Corso of Victor Emmanuel, between two inclosures densely packed with spectators. It is officially ascertained that the immense, imposing cortege contained six thousand representativs of associations, one thousand nine hundred and seventy flags and banners, and a hundred bands of music. This will giv an idea of the greatness, truly marvelous, of the ceremony of to-day. As the cortege passed along, continued, incessant, and frantic applause greeted it, to which those composing it responded with acclamations to Giordano Bruno and the Eternal City, and to freedom of thought.

The immense crowds repeated the acclamations, and from the windows and balconies waved numberless flags and handkerchiefs. The troops formed cordons at all the cross streets. The cortege enthusiastically applauded the army, and the soldiers presented arms. The spectacle was imposing, indescribable. The head of the cortege reached the "Field of Flowers" at 10:30, and the rear was still at the summit of the National street.

The enthusiasm is grand. Processions of students waving handkerchiefs and many-colored caps are responded to with enthusiastic vivas. The bands play, alternating the patriotic hymns of 1848, the hymn of Garibaldi, and the Marseillaise, amid grand acclamations. The immense Via Nazionale seems a vast forest. All Liberal Rome has come to giv wings to the cortege. Nothing like it. No more imposing demonstration has been seen in Rome since 1870.

Many windows of houses inhabited by clericals are closed. And this is not the only clerical reprisal. Yesterday evening the clericals affixed a little manifesto as follows: Wanted, to find a lost brown (Bruno) dog answering to the name Giordano. Finder please fling him in the Tiber." Almost immediately there was posted under it a strip on which was written "This dog is mad. Take him to Leo street, number 13."

The most noted clericals are leaving the city to-day, and Cardinal Rampolla is distributing railroad tickets to persons wishing to leave. . . .

The august "Place of the Field of Flowers" is beautifully decorated. The benches are in the form of an amphitheater. In the interior are pennons bearing the coats-of-arms of all the Italian cities, crowned with laurels. Behind the monument waves a great white standard upon which, in black letters, is the announcement of the execution of Giordano Bruno as it was published Feb. 19, 1600. A pennant bears a grand laurel crown. At the left of the statue is erected a platform for the orators. The monument is draped in white. The seats of the deputies, representing Rome, Nola, the Italian cities, universities, etc., are thronged. The mayors of Rome and of Nola, and the official representativs of Rome in the Chambers, are present. As the cortege enters the "Field of Flowers" the applause is tremendous, and the flags are waved toward the monument. . .

On unveiling the statue the applause lasted eight minutes, amounting to a perfect frenzy, a sublime apotheosis. Hector Ferrari, the artist of the monument, was presented with a gold medal by Commandini, as the homage of the committee of 1876. . .

On the evening of the 12th the series of celebrations closed with a banquet of the notables and the representativs of the Liberal press. Commemorativ medals and lithographs of the martyr were generally distributed.

A representation of "Trovatore" took place at the theater, the students filling the parquet. Scarcely had the committee arrived when a grand demonstration took place, with prolonged shouting of "Viva Giordano Bruno." The royal march and the hymn of Garibaldi were played. At the exit from the theater the artist Hector Ferrari was carried away in triumph on the shoulders of the crowd. . . .

The fête of Giordano Bruno was celebrated in Bologna, Castelfranco, Cosenza, Faenza, Genoa, Messina, Ravenna, Parma, Venice, and in several cities of Italian Switzerland. . . .

The clerical organs publish protests against the celebration in honor of Bruno, but they mostly emanate from the clericals themselvs and from clerical institutions and societies.

Giordano Bruno.

JUNE 9, 1889.

I.

Not from without us, only from within,
Comes or can ever come upon us light
Whereby the soul keeps ever truth in sight.
No truth, no strength, no comfort man may win,
No grace for guidance, no release from sin,
Save of his own soul's giving. Deep and bright
As fire enkindled in the core of night
Burns in the soul where once its fire has been
The light that leads and quickens thought inspired
To doubt and trust and conquer. So he said
Whom Sidney, flower of England, lordliest head
Of all we love, loved: but the fates required
A sacrifice to hate and hell, ere fame
Should set with his in heaven Giordano's name.

II.

Cover thine eyes and weep, O child of hell,
Gray spouse of Satan, Church of name abhorred,
Weep, withered harlot, with thy weeping lord.
Now none will buy the heaven thou hast to sell
At price of prostituted souls, and swell
Thy loveless list of lovers. Fire and sword
No more are thine: the steel, the wheel, the cord,
The flames that rose round living limbs, and fell
In lifeless ash and ember, now no more
Approve thee godlike. Rome, redeemed at last
From all the red pollution of thy past,
Acclaims the brave bright face that smiled of yore
Even on the fire that caught it round and clomb
To cast its ashes on the face of Rome.

—Algernon Charles Swinburne in the Athenæum.

For the People.

We are the hewers and delvers who toil for another's gain,
The common clods and the rabble, stunted of brow and brain,
What do we want, the gleaners, of the harvests we hav reaped?
What do we want, the neuters, of the honey we hav heaped?

We want the drones to be driven away from our golden hoard;
We want to share in the harvest; we want to sit at the board;
We want what sword or suffrage has never yet won for man,
The fruits of his toil God promised when the curse of toil began.

Ye hav tried the sword and scepter, the cross and the sacred word,
In all the years, and the kingdom is not yet here of the Lord.
We are tired of useless waiting; we are tired of fruitless prayers.
Soldier and churchman and lawyer—the failure, is it not theirs?

What gain is it to the people that a God laid down his life,
If, twenty centuries after, his world be a world of strife?
If the serried ranks be facing each other with ruthless eyes
And steel in their hands, what profits a savior's sacrifice?

Ye hav tried and failed to rule us; in vain to direct hav tried;
Not wholly the fault of the ruler; not utterly blind the guide;
Mayhap there needs not a ruler; mayhap we can find the way.
At least ye hav ruled to ruin; at least ye hav led astray.

What matter if king or consul or president holds the rein,
If crime and poverty ever be links in the bondman's chain?
What careth the burden-bearer that Liberty packed his load,
If Hunger presses behind him with a sharp and ready goad?

There's a serf whose chains are of paper, there's a king with a parchment crown;
There are robber knights and brigands in factory, field, and town.
But the vassal pays his tribute to a lord of wage and rent;
And the baron's toll is Shylock's with a flesh and blood per cent.

The seamstress bends to her labor all night in a narrow room;
The child, defrauded of childhood, tiptoes all day at the loom;
The soul must starve; for the body can barely on husks be fed;
And the loaded dice of a gambler settle the price of bread.

Ye hav shorn and bound the Samson and robbed him of learning's light;
But his sluggish brain is moving; his sinews hav all their might.
Look well to your gates of Gaza, your privilege, pride, and caste!
The Giant is blind but thinking, and his locks are growing fast.

Sabbatarianism in Boston.

From the Boston Advertiser.

C. B. Botsford, who livs out on Garfield avenue, West Roxbury, is a prominent deacon in the Congregational church.

He sold a lot of standing grass to Alvin Spear. Last Saturday the grass was cut, and Sunday, there being signs of rain, Spear, his father, and two other men proceeded to shake the hay and store it away in a barn.

This went against the conscience of Deacon Botsford, and, upon the men refusing to stop work at his command, he had them all arrested. In court yesterday morning the judge ruled that they were not engaged in a work of necessity, and they were fined $10 and costs each for Sabbath-breaking. They appealed.

Evolution's Pious Enemies.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: My attention has been called to a recent criticism of the doctrin of Evolution, by Mr. Lemuel J. Potts, on pages 403 and 404 of your paper. Permit me a brief word in reply.

Your correspondent complains that "none of the noted scientists that believe in evolution hav attempted to answer Mr. Hall, though invited and urged by him to do so, but instead they choose to maintain a discreet silence in regard to his book ('The Problem of Human Life Here and Hereafter'), as he predicted they would do." Now, I do not assume to rank myself among "the noted scientists who believe in evolution," being but a humble student in the field of science, nor hav I read the book of Mr. Hall; but, judging of its contents by Mr. Potts's comments and quotations, I assume, without hesitation, that the reason why the "noted scientists" hav omitted to reply to its arguments is that they hav deemed such an effort on their part a needless waste of time, and a useless distraction from the useful work to which they hav consecrated their lives. The opponents of Evolution are unfortunate, almost without exception, in displaying in their criticisms such an absolute ignorance or misconception of what the evolutionist claims to be true, that "noted scientists" and other intelligent people who do comprehend the doctrin and understand something of the evidence on which it rests are justified in ignoring their screeds, and trusting to the truth as it is in nature and in history, to justify itself to all unbiased and intelligent minds.

That the theory of evolution "has found favor with a majority of the scholars of our times" is, to your correspondent, no evidence of its truth. If, instead of "scholars," he had written "theologians," and if the doctrin had found favor with the latter class (the contrary, we know, is true), we might agree with him; but when to the "scholars" or intelligent students of scientific literature we add the immense body of scientific investigators, and when we find that the latter class not only by a bare majority, but almost without exception, are believers in the doctrin of evolution, then, surely, we hav some evidence in this fact of its probable truth. For, if these men are not competent to judge of its truth, who is? Surely not Mr. A. Wilford Hall, who is, by your correspondent's own testimony, attacking evolution in the interests of a moribund orthodoxy, who "produces no evidence of man's origin other than the story of creation in Genesis," and who "assumes the miraculous creation of all specific forms as the only consistent hypothesis of the origin of species!"

As to Darwin's admission that a few forms or a single form of life was originally produced by special creation, it is admitted by all consistent evolutionists that such an assumption is illogical and inconsistent with the other features of the Darwinian theory. Mr. Darwin himself doubtless rejected this solution in his later days. It is also admitted by most evolutionists at the present day, that the Darwinian factor of natural selection does not furnish a complete explanation of organic development. This Darwin himself freely granted, as in the passages quoted by your correspondent. He himself suggested the additional factor of sexual selection, supplementary to the influence of natural selection, and recognized also the influence of artificial selection in the breeding of animals, the culture of vegetal products, and the training of men. The fact that natural selection is not a complete explanation of the phenomena of organic development, and that Spencer, Cope, Huxley, Haeckel, Wallace, and others hav suggested other natural influences which are at work in the processes of evolution, is, therefore, no argument against the doctrin. "Noted scientists" would deem it a futil waste of time to discuss such a question with Mr. Hall or any other of the self-constituted critics of evolution.

Permit me now a brief rejoinder to some of the assumed arguments against evolution suggested by Mr. Potts:

"If Darwin's theory of natural selection were true, there would be no lower animals in existence." Such a statement is of itself sufficient evidence of a complete ignorance or misapprehension of what Darwinism actually teaches. No evolutionist ever held or taught that all the organisms of a given species evolved into higher or different organisms. On the contrary, it is only as organisms are brought under different environing conditions that changes are initiated. Certain animals and plants of a given species which by reason of climatic changes, removal to different localities, the intrusion of new forms of life into their static environment, or by any other supposable reason, are compelled to exercise greater or varying faculties in the struggle for existence, by such exercise are modified in function and structure, and by slow increments of change develop specific differences. Those organisms which are not subjected to these changing conditions remain as they were originally. Being subjected to them and not possessing sufficient vitality to adapt themselvs to the new environment, they are gradually eliminated; but this process is so very gradual that it takes ages of time to effect their complete extinction, and even now, looking over the entire field of the geological evidences, we can only say of the leading genera and species that they hav undergone from age to age a gradual modification, and that whereas at one period the mollusk was the prevailing form of animal life, at another the fish attains preëminence, at another the saurian, at another the huge mammals of a more recent period, and last of all man. The continued existence of the lower forms of life is not only not inconsistent with the doctrin of evolution, it is a fact required by the doctrin. To suppose the complete extinction of a lower species on the evolution of a higher would be to predicate cataclysmic changes in an otherwise absolutely uniform and rigid environment, and an absolute lack of adaptability in the organism, two conditions which rarely prevail—but wherever they do prevail in limited localities, the extinction of the lower organism surely follows. As a rule, however, changes in environing conditions are going on, gradually, all the time—so gradually that organisms adapt themselvs largely to the changing conditions. New species are evolved only when changes of function and structure are an easier solution of the problem of existence than gradual adaptation and slight modification of the old.

"An unanswerable proof that species are special creations, and not the work of evolution, is that nature has drawn the line between them; they can not hybridize and produce new species." This is another anti-evolutionist fallacy, resulting from a misapprehension of the doctrin. Every evolutionist admits the existence of fixed types, that do not and never will evolve into different types. The earlier forms are usually the more plastic. The points of differentiation are not between existing species, but a long way down the scale of organic life. Evolution does not involve seriality of development. Life-forms are related to each other as the twigs, branches, and limbs of a tree, somewhere, doubtless, uniting in one parent trunk. Man is not descended from any extant species of ape; nor will any of these species ever evolve into men. Nay, to do so would be to violate the principles of evolution.

As to the "missing link," that bugbear of the anti-evolutionist, it is admitted that there is not only one, but there are many such gaps in the discovered order of organic succession. But, on the other hand, the number of discovered links is almost innumerable, and every year adds new ones to the cabinet of the evolutionist. Life-forms hav only been preserved in the rocks under favorable conditions, and it is hardly to be expected that the chain of discovered links will ever be complete. But the pertinent fact is that the discovered links do prove the truth of the doctrin, whereas the "missing links" prove nothing except that they are missing. The man against whom five witnesses swore that they saw him steal a horse brought thirty who swore that they didn't see him steal it. But he was convicted in spite of their evidence. They were, unfortunately for him, only "missing links."

The proofs of evolution from homologies of form and structure, from rudimentary organs, from embryology, from geographical distribution, from discovered links as in the case of the horse, are overwhelming and convincing to any unbiased and intelligent mind. It is doubtful, however, whether they would ever convince a theologian of the stamp of Mr. A. Wilford Hall.

Evolution a Fact.

How strange that many persons still persist in deciding before they hav examined the evidence on both sides! I venture the assertion that your contributor L. J. Potts has himself never taken the trouble to read Haeckel's "History of Creation" or Darwin's "Descent of Man;" yet he reads Dr. Hall's criticisms and thinks they are conclusiv. If the writer of this had not been through them all, he would not attempt to say anything. Dr. Hall's arguments spring from a desire to defend the Bible, and his criticisms are, like those of Lambert on Ingersoll, chiefly a play upon words. He selects a particular phrase and makes all he can out of it. But I fail to remember where he once attempted to bring forth facts to disprove the survival of the fittest, natural selection, the laws of heredity, or any of the fundamental principles of the evolution theory.

And the theory cannot be overthrown or proved false till it is proved that natural selection is an impossibility; that the fittest hav never survived; that like does not beget like; and that there are absolutely no such things as variations in living organisms. And this is a task that Dr. Hall or his follower Potts will never undertake.

It is a favorit method of foggy philosophers to talk about missing links, as though it was absolutely necessary that Darwin should be able to put his finger on every link and point it out to every uneducated clodhopper in the world.

How much evidence would it take to satisfy Friend Potts before he would admit that the theory is conclusivly proved? There are hundreds of thousands of facts that go to prove evolution and not one to disprove it, and yet because we lack a few geological specimens—because our list of facts is not absolutely infinit or limitless—he says: "Conclusiv testimony proving man's relation to lower animals has never yet been discovered." He probably is possessed of infinit knowledge, and knows of all the testimony that has been discovered.

Because Darwin in his "Origin of Species" does not deny a creation, he is accused of believing in one. It is very evident from his "Descent of Man" and later works that he and Haeckel had no quarrel of ideas on that point.

Now as to "evolution being a change from simple to complex," or "from complex to simple." Both are true. That is not, however, one of the fundamentals of evolution. If a change is useful; if it better enables a creature to survive, it matters not whether it is the development of new organs or the loss of old ones. The survival of the fittest rules.

Friend Potts says: "If the survival of the fittest is true, there should be no lower animals in existence." How so? That sounds like Dr. Hall, who never could seem to get it into his head that there is a limit to evolution. Every form remains the same generation after generation, if there is no change in its environment, and if it is already adapted or in harmony with its present surroundings. To illustrate. A sparrow is a perfect bird, perfectly adapted to its surroundings. Longer wings, longer beak, longer legs, change of color or size, would be no advantage, and any variations in these respects would be more troublesome than useful in this country, and with its present mode of life; hence if such variations occurred, they would be more likely to die out than to reproduce their kind in large numbers. But it has been proved by experiment that plants and animals transported to a different environment do and will change and adapt themselvs thereto, to such an extent, too, that they are regarded by zoologists as distinct species.

Friend Potts says: "An unanswerable proof that species were separate creations is that they cannot hybridize." Well, well! If that is so, it would be news to some men like Haeckel, who hav seen it done over and over again. True, the tendency of abnormal forms is to revert, and especially so if they are cumbersome or useless. But the slight variations by which evolution is claimed to hav worked can hardly be considered abnormal or deformities.

As to the development of wings. Does Dr. Hall attempt to prove that fishes' fins were not perfect and useful in air as well as water? There are plenty of links to show the development of birds from winged reptils and the reptils from fish. There is nothing better established in the world than the evolution theory, Dr. Hall and other pseudo scientists notwithstanding.

His handling of the evolution question is such a mess of quibblings, distortions, and ignorance, that it merits no notice from those he attacks. The desire to partially counteract the tendency of Friend Potts's article alone prompts me to write this. Many who hav read only one side are liable to be influenced by it to their own injury. But let the truth be known though the pride of man should fall.

The Origin of Christianity.

One fact must never be forgotten when looking for the origin of Christianity—and no history of Christianity can be correct that ignores it—and that is the resemblance between it and Buddhism. From the semi-divine infant and savior to the complete organization of the churches, they are identical, with the sole exceptions that the savior of Buddhism was a teacher, while the savior of Christianity was a sacrifice—"the lamb slain from the foundation of the world," and Christianity adopted the hell of the Persians, with the eternal punishment of the unrepentant, while Buddhism taught the final restoration of all men through the transmigration of souls.

Now, the first question suggested here is, which is the elder of the two religions? And the answer is, Buddhism. The second question is, What caused the change in the character of the savior? And to this the reply is, the adoption of the Hebrew scriptures by one of the churches. And to the question, "What churches?" the answer is, One of the "Asiatic churches," as Mosheim calls them, which were founded by Buddhist missionaries three centuries B.C. in Syria and Egypt. And their belief in the eternity of matter, in a semi-divine teacher instead of a sacrifice, in probation after death accomplished by the transmigration of the souls of the unrepentant through other bodies, and their organization and ceremonials continued to our day in the church of Rome, prove their Buddhistic or Asiatic origin.

Basilides, an Egyptian in the second century, taught that disobedient spirits after death passed successivly into other bodies, and his followers and other Egyptian and Asiatic sects believed in a phantom Jesus. And in the third century Manes maintained that the souls of the impenitent passed into the bodies of animals, where they remained till they had expiated their guilt. This certainly shows how extensivly known and popular were the teachings of the Buddhists, especially when we find a believer in Paul preaching the transmigration of souls.

Manes also declared that our gospels and Paul's epistles were corrupted. In this he sustains the charge of the followers of Marcion, that their opponents took their doctrins from four adulterated gospels. All the Asiatic and Egyptian or Gnostic sects of the second century were older than Christianity. For the first Christian sect was that to which Marcion belonged—which could not hav been known as a Christian sect till after its adoption of the Old Testament, which took place in the third century, after which adoption our gospels and epistles were given to the world as the New Testament by Origen. And Mosheim, while acknowledging the obscurity and doubt in which the early history of Christianity is enveloped, tells us that Marcion was a member of one of the Asiatic sects. And he gives us Marcion's belief, the account of which, so far as it goes, agrees with that given by the author of "Supernatural Religion."

This sect believed in a good and an evil principle and in an intermediate deity, also evil, namely, Jehovah. Their belief as to the character of Jehovah shows that this sect understood that potentate, and did not repudiate, as our Christians do, the beneficent gods of the first chapter of Genesis. Their Jesus had a shadowy resemblance of a body, and his purpose was the destruction of the evil principle and Jehovah. Such is Mosheim's statement. And I hav shown in a former article, by quotations from Marcion, his detestation of the God of the Jews.

When this Asiatic church had accepted the Old Testament as inspired, it substituted a material for its aerial or phantom Jesus; and, as the semi-divine Buddhist savior had been born of a human mother, it professed to find, in the seventh chapter of Isaiah, the prediction of a similar event; and, accordingly, we find in the twenty-third verse of the first chapter of Matthew this announcement, by the angel, of the expected birth of Jesus: "Behold, the virgin shall conceive, and bear a son, and call his name Immanuel." But his being born of a virgin is not the only thing in which Jesus is made to resemble the Buddhist savior. More than twenty incidents in the life of Jesus are taken from the life of Crishna. Now, as our gospels were to be an account of the life of a person who never existed, and of events which never happened, it was necessary that they should be located in a place but little known, and represented as having happened at a time beyond the memory of anyone living. Therefore, Jerusalem was chosen as the place, and the period was two hundred years before the record of the events. Besides, as Jesus was to be the son of Jehovah, it was necessary that his birthplace should be Palestine—the only region over which Jehovah claimed jurisdiction.

It should not be necessary, after this presentation of facts concerning the primitiv Christian church—the Asiatic church of Mosheim, who, without question, is as worthy of belief as any church historian—to say that our gospels are all pure fictions, and that nothing related in them ever happened in Jerusalem or anywhere else. Nor can we place any confidence in certain statements in Acts, which are made, evidently, for giving credit to the gospel fictions. For instance, in the second chapter we hav three thousand souls converted in one day in Jerusalem; and in the fourth, five thousand men; and at other times multitudes of men and women. Were this true the whole population of Jerusalem would hav been converted, except, possibly, infants at the breast; and Josephus would hav found himself the sole representativ of the world's people. And yet we read, in Acts, that the "disciples" were called Christians, first, at Antioch; and, in chapter xv, James says: "Simeon hath rehearsed how first God did visit the gentiles, to take out of them a people for his name. And to this agree the words of the prophets," etc. So, too, the passage in the epistle to the Romans, "Your faith is proclaimed throughout the whole world." This, if Paul wrote it, proves too much.

Such admissions were grave mistakes, blunders of the author of Acts, and the compiler of the gospels; as they prove the antiquity and wide diffusion of the Gnostic churches among the gentiles.

It takes the element of fear to fill churches; and when, in the new gospels, the material Jesus threatened unbelievers with hell, converts must hav multiplied exceedingly. There is contemporary authority for the fact that, then as now, the great majority of believers were from the ignorant classes. But the supremacy of the Christian church was established by the Emperor Constantine, who, although he fought under the banner of the cross, was not baptized till the close of his infamous life.

As soon as this church became supreme, it concealed its origin, compelled assent to its gospels and a recognition of its savior, and finally persecuted its rivals out of existence. And now the belief is universal that the Gnostic churches, which were of similar origin and equal antiquity with this Christianized Asiatic church, were heretical, and founded in the second and third centuries.

As Marcion held for doctrin Paul's ten epistles, spent his life in the advocacy of Paul's opinions, and was denounced as a heretic by Tertullian, as was Paul, they must hav been of the same faith and of the same Asiatic church. We can learn nothing about Paul from the epistles now said to be his, which were corrupted as early as the third century, and hav always been a subject of controversy.

S. PALMER.

Jezebel.

A word for Jezebel, she who has been held up as an "awful example" of womankind for a number of years, Hebrew and Christian alike avoiding the bestowal of the name on their daughters—why they avoid the name of Jael, she that was "blessed above other women" on account of her handiness with a hammer, and the nerve she displayed in driving a nail on a certain occasion, I can't understand.

Yes, a word for Jezebel, she who has long been the under dog in the fight, with never a friend in the world; she who was the daughter of a king and the wife of a king—not the same, but another king—her father being the Zidonian king, Ethbaal, a relativ, perchance, of Baal, Jahveh's competitor, and a god of parts and palpability, prepared in pewter or any other mixed or straight metal, while her spouse was one Ahab, one of the numerous "Slim Jim" kings "ruling Israel" from time to time, and who were away off from the type of David, Solomon, et al.

This blooded—blue-blooded—feminin of the Zidonian strain was a high-stepper, no doubt, and imperious to a fault, perhaps, as well as impervious to the teachings of the priests of Jahveh, but she was a woman still, and ought to hav a fair show, malgre the fact that Jahveh waxed wroth because she married Ahab, or more properly, perhaps, because Ahab "took her to wife," she being a more or less offensiv partisan of Baal, in spite of which he wooed and, having won, wedded her—bully for Ahab!

Of course, Jezebel gave Ahab to understand, when he came to her father's palace on spoony missions bent, that he must cotton to Baal, if counting on winning her royal hand and heart, and Ahab cottoned, making no bones of it, but making Jahveh madder than a hornet! But all the same so, and moreover, if so, what then? Love laughs at locksmiths and liver-pads, why not at Jahvehs and Baals, or gods by any other names? Anyhow, love got in its work in this case, as it does in the majority of cases, and a double capture was made, Jezebel and Baal the captors and Ahab doubly captiv. It was a "good catch" for Jezebel, from the matrimonial standpoint, but a better one for Baal, from the religious standpoint, for, as went Israel's king, so went the Israelites, by a large majority!

It appears, from the legend in the Holy Queer, that Jezebel, at a certain time, had made it exceedingly warm for some of Jahveh's tooters, or "prophets," as they were called, even to the extent of getting away with them—strange that Jahveh didn't protect his "prophets"—but the fact, or otherwise, is merely mentioned, no details of Jezebel's action in the premises being given. I suppose she did as any other woman in her place would hav done, conscientiously rid the land of a crowd of priestly drones who were forever hanging round the market places, and continually shooting off their mouths at the opposition God—the God she had been taught to believe was the "only true and original Jacobs"—until she became too worked up for anything, and so decided to let her go, Gallagher, and end the discussion. These, no doubt, are the "true facts" in the case, were the history of the times truly unfolded.

Later on, immediately after Elijah, the "Fire Bug" par eminence, had squared the prophet account by wiping out four hundred and fifty of the Baal contingent of prophets, Jezebel shows up for one brief but thrilling moment on the stage of affairs, as presented in the Holy Queer, as when, madder than a bee in a tar-bucket, she sends this telegram to Lije: "So let the gods do to me, and more also, if I make not thy life as the life of one of them [referring to the dead prophets of Baal]—by to-morrow about this time."

Take notice, please, how non-committal she was concerning the hour—"about this time," she says, meaning to allow for contingencies, you know.

But this message, threatening and dire in the woof of its intent, was a wild mistake on the part of Jezebel, showing she was not cut for a strategist. I believe Grant once notified an opponent that he should move on his works in the morning; but then, he had the place invested, you see, and the notification was simply an act of courtesy. Not so with Jezebel. Lije was not "invested," but in the open, and, forearmed with the forewarning, lit out for Beersheba by fast mule express, limited, camping out that night under a juniper-tree and, strangely enough, after skipping to save his life, wishing he was dead, the duffer! Why didn't he remain, if life were not worth living? Jezebel would hav cooked his goose for him, or had it cooked, to the queen's taste! However, that was his affair.

Some considerable time elapses before we again hear of Jezebel. I take it that, mortified at the thought of the message so stupidly sent, she laid back in lavender, but in retirement, kicking herself, figurativly, for having been such a Jenny. However, she turns up at length, and, for the first time, really, shows herself to be of the "strong-minded" variety of womankind—in her seclusion she had schooled herself, I fancy, and determined never again to be written down a Jenny!

Where Jezebel came to the front, in this instance, was in Jezreel, in that more or less celebrated vineyard transaction, when she came in a winner, but, I am pained to say, resorting to measures that not even Mme. Ann O'Delia Diss Debar, or Princess Editha Lolita Montez and countess of Langfeldt, would hav felt justified in adopting, preferring spiritualistic to such realistic and drastic means to the end. You see, Jezebel's ideas with regard to the acquisition of property were not based on the fundamental bed-rock of justice, and, albeit she got there all the same, she violated the sanctities of the traditions relating to meum et tuum, according to abstract theories regarding the same, if not more so; in other words, it was not a square deal that she made with one Naboth, the neighbor who owned the vineyard which Ahab coveted for years, and which very suddenly was not Naboth's, for Ahab took it, all on account of the part played by Jezebel. You all know the story, I presume; if not, and you wish to, see 1 Kings xxi.

The state of the case, before Jezebel got in her work, was this: Naboth owned a vineyard over against the garden of Ahab. It was a dandy plantation, and Ahab yearned for it as Jay Gould yearns for the railroads he has not yet gobbled; but unlike the latter he offered full value, spot cash, for it. Naboth, heavy with sentimentalism, declined the offer with thanks. This makes Ahab sick at the stomach, and he goes home and to bed, the duffer, refusing the regular beer and pretzel lunch set out by Jezebel, who, ignorant of what has transpired, makes a few feeble remarks to this effect: "What is the matter, hubby, that thou eatest no pretzel and drinkest no beer?" Ahab then informs her of the failure of his negotiations for the adjoining vineyard, when Jezebel's whole nature seems to change, presto, and she shoots off a conundrum to this effect: "Who's a running Israel, you or Naboth?" then tells him to get up and into his duds, and tackle the beer and be merry, for she will work the racket herself, and get the vineyard if he will promis her a new sealskin sack, which he does, of course, she at once setting about to get in her work, for account of which see as suggested above.

Jezebel was a good deal like "our-country-right-or-wrong" patriots, in her devotion to Ahab. She was for him in any event, even if stooping to conquer by wrong herself. Whatever else you may say of her, she was a faithful wife. Her hubby wanted that vineyard. He couldn't get it for love nor money. She resolved to get it for him, and she got it! The means employed are not to be commended. But she was a queen and more or less of an autocrat. She played a lone hand in a high game of statecraft, for reasons of state, and won! Queen Bess, several years later, played many a game more deeply tinged with turpitude! One Jael, of those earlier days, and infamous memory, committed a most dastardly murder, and, because she belonged to the Jahveh party, was "blessed above all women!" Had conditions been reversed in the Jezebel-Naboth case, it is ducats to dingbats that Jahveh had never sent word by Elijah, to Jezebel, that she should be eaten by dogs, some fine day!

Jezebel disappears after this most pleasing assurance from Jahveh. Like a hot potato she is dropped as suddenly. Later on, after her hubby has been lured to his death by a "lying spirit" sent by Jahveh, and Jehu is Israel's king, she comes again to the front—the front window of the palace, out of which she is thrown, at Jehu's command, smash to the sidewalk, where the dogs get in their work, according to the word of Jahveh!

Dangerous, very dangerous it was in those days to monkey with the mighty warlord of the circumambient and adjacent territory, including that portion of the earth's surface where said warlord had his headquarters in the saddle, frequently if not oftener. Fatal, oh, most fatal to kick against the diamond-pointed pricks of Zion, the result being not only busted boots and mangled toes, but supervening gangrene and lockjaw, with collapse in the near by and bye. Poor Jez! It was all up with her when Jahveh took a hand in against her, on account of her kicking proclivities. She was doomed to perish miserably in the lowest depths of the consomme of heavenly vengeance—"Vengeance is mine!" saith the Lord; ergo, vengeance is nothing if not heavenly!

Poor Jez! A devoted wife, if a woman of wilful parts, let us hope that, though dark her character in spots, she was not so black as painted. Selah!

Resist the Despots.

We earnestly continue to urge upon our friends in the Western territories whose constitutions as states are preparing, to use their utmost exertions to hav those constitutions framed on true and pure secular American principles. The opposition is at hand there and doing its best to hav them framed on Dark Age principles. On the 15th R. C. Wylie, district secretary of the National Reform Association, presented a screed in regard to God in the Constitution, in which he says that nearly all state constitutions contain acknowledgments of God, but the convention should desire something more definit. God should be acknowledged as the source of that authority which is vested in the majority. His will should be accepted as the supreme law in all moral issues in the sphere of political life. The Lord should be recognized as the king of nations. Besides this, continues the document, a foundation should be laid for necessary legislation on the question of marriage and divorce, the Sabbath question, and moral instruction in the public schools.

Who can say what influence may not be exerted on the safety and happiness of the generations of our children and grandchildren by proper steps taken by us now?

Happiness.

We hav too long neglected replying to the following communication from our good friend Mr. Van Denburgh, of Milwaukee, Wis.:

"In your recent treatment of the Design Argument, you say that many of the organs, with their functions, are imperfect, and this in a general way, and mention particularly the eye and ear. Are we to draw the inference from your line of argument that non-existence would hav been preferable to existence? Can we draw any other?"

In our view, preferableness of non-existence by no means follows from imperfection of some of our organs; and we are at a loss to see how the inference was drawn. Existence is desirable accordingly as its pleasure overbalances its pain. If all or most organs were very imperfect, pain would predominate; but such is not the case. Most of our organs work with a sufficient degree of perfection to afford us a sum of pleasure that, however estimates may vary, at any rate induces most to insist most emphatically upon staying in life—as anyone will find that tries to get them out of it.

Our friend would seem to visit his dissatisfaction at finding his organs are not perfect, rather upon those who make the revelation to him than upon the organs for being so. How long would our friend hav gone about with his throat catching cold, his ears getting frozen, his teeth having to be pulled, his stomach refusing to digest, before finding out that his organs were imperfect? We did not construct things. But, finding them full of painful imperfection, we hav set about helping get them right; and Freethinkers need not be told that the first step in any such work is thoroughly to lay open to the light of day the defects to be remedied.

But there is more to the matter than is touched by the special question of Mr. Van Denburgh. There is so much to it that, while we hav sufficiently met the points raised, we are disposed to say upon it a good deal more. After all, what is troubling our friend is not the few particular points that he describes. It is the whole of that great question of which they are parts—the question of the happiness of man, his prospects for happiness, and especially his prospects for happiness under that great Rationalistic change that is now coming over the face of the world. This is the question of all questions. Every creed must face it. Every creed must giv to it its answer. If the creed cannot giv happiness, away with it. Now Rationalism presents itself, and it must make out its answer like the others. This is what our friend wants. He wants to know what proposals Rationalism can make to bring happiness to the poor tortured spirit of humanity. He feels in sympathy the frightful anguish that is now the lot of many of his fellows, and he yearns for relief for them earnestly and anxiously. So do we all; and we will direct him to the finding of an answer as best it is in our power.

The first thing to say is that we can only direct him, and others, to the answer. We cannot compress a satisfactory consideration of the problem into the space afforded here. But we can direct to the literature in which will be found what is wanted.

Evolution—it is in the exposition of this doctrin of science that the solution lies. It is in the literature on the subject of evolution that will be found what is wanted.

Evolution is known to most only as a principle explaining the descent of man from lower animal orders. It is much more. The discovery of this tremendous principle—hated by priests, of course, like all discoveries—has not merely explained that matter, but has shed a flood of light upon every department of human knowledge. It has been applied first to one department, then to another, and gradually extended till now it covers everything. Every one of the sciences is being written over to conform to it; it would perhaps not be exaggeration to say that it constitutes half of science. Then it should hav occurred to anyone anxious to know about the matter of happiness, to turn to evolution and see what that had to say upon it.

We might hav said that the solution wanted would hav been found in science, or in Rationalism, instead of saying in evolution; they amount to much the same thing; evolution is a part of science and Rationalistic doctrin; but it is evolution that touches the problem most directly.

We need not concern ourselvs to trace our matter in hand up to the broadest principles of evolution. We will notice only a certain principle which evolution lays down in biology—that is, in the science of living beings. And that principle is: The functions of living beings tend constantly to perfect adaptation. This principle settles the whole matter. The pain our friend is thinking of results from the imperfect adaptation of his organs to their work, to their environment. When an organ is adapted to its work, its exercise invariably produces pleasure; it must produce pleasure, and can produce nothing else. When it is not, its exercise produces pain. Pleasure is the sign of complete adaptation; pain, of incomplete. Notice a dog leaping gladly when full of spirits, a child or man reaping exquisit delight from exercise when full of freshness and vigor. Or notice the pleasure flowing from exercise of intellectual faculties that are suited to their task—the enthusiastic student or man of learning at work. On the other hand, notice the painful efforts of the enfeebled, of awkward beginners, or, in the case of intellectual work, of a student not constituted for mental application. In the former of these cases the organs are adapted to their objects, and their exercise therefore produces pleasure; in the latter, they are not adapted, and their exercise produces pain.

What is to be noted is, that it is the tendency of each imperfect function in time to adapt itself. It does this by several processes. The individuals with functions least adapted perish. Besides this, as it is a physiological law that any part grows with use, any part that has a new strain thrown upon it tends to grow to meet that strain. But the details cannot appear here.

It may be said: But man's functions are still imperfect—still unsuited to his state. The reason is, that he has just emerged from a lower state, and has retained many functions suitable to that state, and not acquired all that are suitable to his new state. Combativness, ferocity, is a faculty of the former kind. A faculty of the latter kind that he yet possesses very imperfectly, is the moral sense. Another faculty required by his new state is the power of the higher regions of the intellect. From imperfect development of this power, reason, logic, he can see but feebly and faintly how to deal with the great public questions, and the result is all the sad blunders and sufferings that we see. When he has been in this state a little more, he must inevitably hav become perfectly adapted to it. That is, perfectly happy.

It may be objected: But there is no order of living creatures that is not often unhappy—suffering from hunger or foes—and why has not one single order become perfectly adapted to its environment? The only answer that can be given is, that the processes of nature are exceedingly slow. If any order could remain long enough in the same environment, it would become perfectly adapted to it. But there has been a continual change of its environment. The full adaptation can be reached only when all possibilities of change hav been exhausted; and it is under man that they are reaching that point. In him will all the long series of living beings reach their end and emerge into happiness; and it is to be hoped that he can then turn back and secure happiness for his suffering kinsmen in the lower orders behind him.

This glance at the matter must necessarily be unsatisfactory; we can only recommend a full study of the literature of evolution. But we will make room for a few words from the "Social Statics" of Herbert Spencer, universally allowed to be the greatest living thinker:

"If there be any conclusivness in the foregoing argument [that all evil results from non-adaptation of constitution to conditions], such a faith [faith in the evanescence of evil and the perfectibility of man] is well founded. As commonly supported by evidence drawn from history, it cannot be considered indisputable. The inference that as advancement has been hitherto the rule, it will be the rule henceforth, may be called a plausible speculation. But when it is shown that this advancement is due to the working of a universal law; and that in virtue of that law it must continue until the state we call perfection is reached, then the advent of such a state is removed out of the region of probability into that of certainty. If anyone demurs to this let him point out the error. Here are the several steps of the argument:

"All imperfection is unfitness to the conditions of existence.

"This unfitness must consist either in having a faculty or faculties in excess; or in having a faculty or faculties deficient; or in both.

"A faculty in excess is one which the conditions of existence do not afford full exercise to; and a faculty that is deficient is one from which the conditions of existence demand more than it can perform.

"But it is an essential principle of life that a faculty to which circumstances do not allow full exercise diminishes; and that a faculty on which circumstances make excessiv demands increases.

"And so long as this excess and this deficiency continue, there must continue decrease on the one hand, and growth on the other.

"Finally, all excess and all deficiency must disappear; that is, all unfitness must disappear; that is, all imperfection must disappear.

"Thus the ultimate development of the ideal man is logically certain—as certain as any conclusion in which we place the most implicit faith: for instance, that all men will die. For why do we infer that all men will die? Simply because, in an immense number of past experiences, death has uniformly occurred. Similarly then as the experiences of all people in all times—experiences that are embodied in maxims, proverbs, and moral precepts, and that are illustrated in biographies and histories—go to prove that organs, faculties, powers, capacities, or whatever else we call them, grow by use and diminish by disuse, it is inferred that they will continue to do so. And if this inference is unquestionable, then is the one above deduced from it—that humanity must in the end become completely adapted to its conditions—unquestionable also.

"Progress, therefore, is not an accident, but a necessity. Instead of civilization being artificial, it is a part of nature; all of a piece with the development of the embryo or the unfolding of a flower. The modifications mankind hav undergone, and are still undergoing, result from a law underlying the whole organic creation; and provided the human race continues, and the constitution of things remains the same, those modifications must end in completeness. As surely as the tree becomes bulky when it stands alone, and slender if one of a group; as surely as the same creature assumes the different forms of cart-horse and race-horse, according as its habits demand strength or speed; as surely as a blacksmith's arm grows large, and the skin of a laborer's hand thick; as surely as the eye tends to become long-sighted in the sailor, and short-sighted in the student; as surely as the blind attain a more delicate sense of touch; as surely as a clerk acquires rapidity in writing and calculation; as surely as the musician learns to detect an error of a semi-tone amidst what seems to others a very babel of sounds; as surely as a passion grows by indulgence and diminishes when restrained; as surely as a disregarded conscience becomes inert, and one that is obeyed activ; as surely as there is any efficacy in educational culture, or any meaning in such terms as habit, custom, practice; so surely must the human faculties be molded into complete fitness for the social state; so surely must the things we call evil and immorality disappear; so surely must man become perfect."

God's Acquaintances.

God's acquaintances—this seems to be as good a term as we can possibly get by which to designate the whole tribe of theologians, preachers, and all of that stripe. It is a term that when thought over a bit will suggest something of the real nature of the position toward us of the clergy—something of the true character of the claims they make. Here are the people all in the world equally—each one with a brain to observe and find out whatever there is to be found out, to assure himself of the existence of any spiritual being that may be behind the world or outside of it if he can find anything of the sort; each with equal capability to read and equal advantages of every kind. If there is anything to be found out, surely these people ought to be able to find it out; and if they do not come across any information about any spiritual ruler, then it would seem that there is no such being. But on a sudden up start a clique of men and make the astounding claim that they know something that the others do not; that they hav run across some choice information that the others hav not—they actually claim that they hav found out all about a universal ruler—that they hav been admitted to his acquaintance and know all about him, his names, family history, appearance, feelings, and his commands how men shall act. What a claim!

Glance over the whole of history and one will find everywhere, in every department of affairs, shrewd rogues trying to deceive their fellows into supporting them in luxury, in return for services really worthless but which they pretend are necessary to the welfare of the people. Kings hav ever consumed the lion's share of the workers' produce, under the pretense that in some mysterious way they were owners of it all and their subjects too, and necessary to their existence; and many other like cheats will easily be brought to mind. But there is in particular one variety of these frauds that bears the closest resemblance to the one which is the subject of this article. Here and there all through history we come across the class of favorits and courtiers of monarchs, extorting streams of money from outsiders in purchase of the good will of the monarch. Some of these represent their court influence as no higher than it is, and giv satisfactory returns for their fees. Some hold out inducements that their influence is far greater than it is, and grossly deceive their petitioners. And vast numbers of others hav made good livings upon representations of influence that they did not possess at all—often being not even so much as acquainted at court. Here, then, we hav the main elements of the problem presented by the clergy with their monstrous claims. We can easily imagin certain cunning rogues spying about for another opening in the line of the courtier business, and finally hitting upon the device of claiming to be courtiers to an invisible monarch dwelling outside the world. But how surpassing other fraudulent claims in sublime impudence is this one! The other courtiers could at least produce testimony of some good that had been effected for suppliants, and they could show that there actually were kings and dukes and counts to appeal to. But the new pretenders could show none of these. The empire of the actual, the visible, had been all preëmpted by their brothers; all that remained for them was the domain of the invisible.

It would seem that a scheme so inferior to the other, so hollow and unsupported by credentials, must hav required great efforts to maintain it. And so it has. It has had to shed oceans of blood. It has had to call in every aid, every device of intrigue and cruelty, that the most subtle ingenuity of its professors could suggest. To silence the tongues of the sensible, observing men that hav continually seen through and denounced its imposture, it has had to elaborate, from the few tortures occasionally employed by ancient peoples, a system of fiendish torments that as much surpass those ever used by the cruelest men for any other purpose, as a human being is surpassed by a devil in hell. Other institutions of man hav been compatible with enlightenment of the people; good ones hav prospered the better for it; even bad ones, as monarchy, hav often permitted, and even forwarded, education of the people. But to maintain this monstrous claim, a different course was necessary. Such a claim could be received only in the deepest and blackest ignorance; enlightenment could not be forwarded, it could not even be permitted.

Faith—this is a thing that stands as an excellent illustration of the extreme methods to which these impostors were forced to resort. Consider for a moment what faith is. We hav heard it soberly and respectfully talked about so much by the dupes around us that perhaps many can hardly see this thing in its nakedness as it really is. But make an effort. When any other man than a preacher presents the evidence of his particular views on any subject, he presents it simply for what it is worth, and one's judgment takes it for just what it is worth, and accepts or rejects just as it finds it worthy of credence. What else could the person presenting the evidence do? What could he do more? It never occurs to him to do anything more. He knows that if he kneeled and begged one to believe it, one could not believe it a bit more. The evidence could still hav on one's mind only just the effect that naturally belonged to it by its reasonableness. The same if he menaced the hearer with a club. The same if he repeated some cabalistic word, some magical charm, that he supposed would effect in the mind a disposition to embrace his doctrin. But mark the extraordinary device of the clergy. They actually hav a cabalistic word, a magical charm, that they mumble over when they present their evidence. And, impossible as it might seem, they actually hav got people into submitting to this charm—into accepting meekly whatever gross invention has this word gabbled over at the end of it. When they hav presented some paltry, incredible testimony for their claims, and the hearer hesitates, they say—"faith." Instantly all becomes clear. That evidence which before was insufficient immediately becomes sufficient. The pill is swallowed. Let a person try to cast aside for a moment the veil of sanctity through which a lifetime under clergy and their dupes has accustomed him to regard this thing, faith, and try to set it before himself in its true shape and nudity. Analyze it and see what it means. Is not what it comes to just this: when a person uses it he beseeches the hearer to make an exception in his individual case and by exerting a vast power of credulity take in a thing admitted to be insufficiently supported by evidence? Now, what could be a more outrageous thing than this? Apply it to other matters and see how it looks there. Suppose a man presenting doctrins on politics, or labor, or anything else, should get up a cabalistic sign, a charm, the repeating of which at the end of a discourse should be the signal for the immediate swallowing of the whole of that discourse by his auditors. What would be thought of such a man and of such a proposition? No man ever does such a thing but in religion. On everything else men go about and say what they hav to say in a manly way, and leave it to be accepted or rejected as it deserves. They never think of adding anything to force or beg that what they hav said be regarded as having twice as much sense as it has. They would be ashamed to. One class, and one class only, does this, and that class is the one that was forced to invent this device by the fact that its pretended domain lies wholly in the invisible world, and cannot hav the slightest proof given of it. Those who hav falsely pretended to be favorits of some earthly monarch hav needed only ordinary devices of fraud; this monstrous device, faith, was required by those pretending to be favorits of a monarch that never had any existence—in short phrase, pretending to be God's acquaintances.

Everything in the system built up by these persons who pretend they hav influence with a mighty unseen ruler, and can hav us vastly benefited or harmed—these God's acquaintances—everything in it, we say, bears one character. Everything bears the mark of having been designed to fill their pockets. They say they hav obtained from their great friend information of a state of happiness that he has for us somewhere—somewhere in the invisible world. The happiness is very, very great. This we can enter by giving them plenty of money. He also has a state of pain somewhere—of course in the invisible world. The pain is very, very great. This we can escape by the same identical process—giving them money. The invention of purgatory is a striking example of the true inward nature of the whole scheme. There is not one word about any such place in the Bible. But, as is easily seen, such an institution could be made much more profitable than a plain hell; so forthwith it was invented. Thus, as we were saying, the impostors go about, crying up the joys of the place they can let people into and the pangs of the place they can keep people out of, till they get people heartily desirous of the one and tremblingly affrighted at the other, when, lo! out comes the means by which the people can obtain their wish—buy this of us, good ladies and gentlemen; patronize no other; exalt us, pay us, let us rule you, and you get all those beautiful things of which we hav told you, and get delivered from all those horrible things of which we hav told you. An apt illustration is that of Voltaire, who likens churchmen to quack doctors with medicin to sell, whose method is first of all to scare us into the belief that we are very sick.

No matter how we follow this out into the details, we find everywhere the same pretense of a God ordering just that which turns out to the profit of his self-constituted friends, his acquaintances. In old Jewish days when one's wealth consisted not so much of money, as now, but mainly of goods, it is surprising what a desire the invisible friend of the priests developed for offerings of goods. Flocks and herds, oil and good things to eat, were what people most sought after in those days, and it is perfectly astonishing how often God wanted these offered on his altars. Offerings of this he wanted, and offerings of that; offerings when this happened, and offerings when that. His acquaintances, to repay their trouble in communicating his directions, were allowed to eat these things when they came off the altar. By looking around now one finds the same ever-during remarkable coincidence between the desires of God and the desires of his confidential friends. God's desires are the desires of the priests; his exaltation is the exaltation of the priests; to believe in God is to believe in the priests; to disobey God is to disobey the priests; to walk in the fear of God is to walk in the fear of priests. When we are told that God is wroth with us in just indignation, it means that we hav done something that makes some priest angry. When we are told that we shall go to hell, it means that some priest hates us so he would put us in a hell if he were able and if there were one. It is recommended that each person go through the next sermon he comes across, and striking out "God," insert in its place the word "priests." Then he will hav all there really is to the matter, stripped of its fine language, plainly before him.

This, then, is what the matter comes to. All men are here with the same faculties, and if they cannot discover any spiritual monarch, they ought to be shrewd enough to suspect the claims of a few who set up the pretense of having discovered one all by themselvs—who say they hav discovered one and hav then been appointed said God's confidential friends—God's acquaintances.

Editorial Notes.

UPON the noble poem to Giordano Bruno, by the distinguished English poet Swinburne, which we reprint on another page, the Catholic Union and Times says: "Swinburne's sympathy with Bruno is the pleasure which an utterly degraded and leprous creature feels when another of similar habits is honored by disciples of Satan."

SOMETHING that is worthy to be remarked upon is the really wonderful effect that we now and then see produced upon Christians by a good and noble Freethought life, in conquering their prejudices and hostility. All must hav seen instances; here is the latest that has come to our notice. In New York city is a man named Simon F. Cummings, by trade a mason, and proprietor of a comely yacht named the Robert G. Ingersoll. As his yacht's name intimates, he is a Freethinker. The number of the polemical battles he is continually getting in with Christians all over his district is probably now beyond ready computation. He is known to all the religious of his neighborhood as an uncompromising and unresting foe of the unjust privileges that they retain in law. Now, of all those religious none know him better than a certain club, fond, like himself, of boating in New York waters, called the Friendship Boat Club, and composed of believers both Protestant and Catholic. Yet on the 14th down marches this club to our friend and presents him with a full set of colors for his yacht, with the name worked in great letters that will be visible no one knows how far over the waters: "Robert G. Ingersoll." Here is something pleasant, and here is something to imitate. Let us all resolve to present to the other side a life as full of manly integrity and lovableness as Mr. Cummings's would appear to be, and reap a like reward to our cause.

Letters from Friends.

GOODWYNSVILLE, VA., July 6, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I hav read with interest the discussion between McArthur and others on Spiritualism, and it seems to me there is a deluge of words and no clear, well-defined stream of logic. I will say a word to Spiritualists. Now, there is either demonstrable truth in Spiritualism or it is a humbug. When the slate rested on Macdonald's head Macdonald knew whether anyone in the room was writing on it or not. Now, let us hear from the Editor. I will giv $100 any time to hav it clearly established that my beloved or "loved and lost" dead still liv. Yes, I would gladly giv any or everything I hav to know that they still liv. And, if it can be proved, it is not superstition, but a fact. But why so much dark when these things are under test? Why not light, the great help and indispensable to any investigation? But it sounds so much like the Southern devotee to hear that it can be proved that the dead still liv. When such assertions come from a Southern pulpiteer I am not surprised, but when a McArthur asserts it I expect him to be ready to prove it. It will not do for truth seekers to make these assertions unless they are able to prove them. I don't mean on paper, but to demonstrate the facts in broad daylight. I don't like this owl and bat business. What is superstition? It seems to me a belief in ghosts, spirits, etc., is superstition. And if I understand it, this is also Spiritualism. If McArthur's dead arose, why is it that we should so disbelieve in the resurrection of Christ?

"For the Spiritualist death has no terrors." Now, can this be so? Did anything ever die without terror? This sounds still more like Southern preaching (I say Southern because our preachers are all terribly orthodox). Suppose we teach our children that the air is full of spirits, don't you think the world would be terribly superstitious?

Yours truly, GEO. W. BARNES.

NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME, WIS., July 3, A.S. 289.

MR. EDITOR: When in the course of human progress, gods and their special devils hav outlived their usefulness, why in the name of humanity and justice are they not gathered to their predecessors and allowed to sleep peacefully in oblivion? We know that Spiritualism killed the devil at least forty years ago; while his prototype, the old Jew God, must hav been on his last legs for many years; for the last sixty years, to my personal knowledge, he has not been able to raise a finger in defense of poor suffering humanity. The latest evidence of the decline and final demise of our poor old God was the late Johnstown horror, in the state of Pennsylvania. Ah, me! Had our God been young and in his prime as of yore, he would hav piled the waters up as a wall, and let his Christian pets march out dry-shod, while, hardening the hearts of all the Infidels, he would hav swept them from the earth into his consuming presence quicker than a cat could lick her ear. He did, however, perform one remarkably divine trick. He built a wall of water around one of the images of his wife, or his mother (I don't know which to call it), which kept her as dry as a bone till the waters were assuaged. There she stood the next morning as smiling as a basket of chips, as though nothing had happened to make such a fuss about. But alas, and alas! our incompetent God seemed utterly incapable of protecting his own property, or saving the lives of those of his pets who built these beautiful churches to his honor and glory. Why not induce some millionaire to bribe Senator Blair to use his almighty influence in putting on the retired list as much of Abraham's God as Americans lay claim to? Then turn all God's houses into institutions of learning, collect all the preachers that are out of the state and other prisons, giv each a rigid examination, and as many as are found competent to instruct the masses employ; but the ignorant, vicious, lying, hypocritical, drunken, amorous sots, who will doubtless be found to vastly outnumber the competent, let them hav their part with the idle rabble that were wont to listen to their hellish orthodox babble. Yea, verily, cast them out of respectable society, and let them be consigned to everlasting innocuous desuetude. I had nearly forgotten the feeble attempt of this imbecil God of Abraham's to save a whole churchful of his pet lambs. He held the floods in check until all had escaped from the church, when through sheer exhaustion he let go his hold, and the merciless torrent smote both church and people with astounding violence. All perished. Alas, Abraham's God proves a failure!

Yours truly, NELSON HUNT.

LEXINGTON, KY., June 27, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I neglected to mention in my last that ladies should bring their judgment to bear upon this question: The heathen affirm that earthly children are born to the gods, but these stories are now treated by Christians with contempt. Christians hav caused heathen temples to be torn down and priests banished. Why, then, should such assertions with regard to the Holy Ghost be made an exception to the rule? Also, why do they not judge thus of miracles? Bible miracles are silly and shameless. St. Ambrose of Milan declared that the excitement of miracles must be kept up, or the "church would go to nothing."

"War and religion" are not efficient educators of the human race, but degrade them to a point where no mental or moral influence can reach them. Barbarous nations spent thousands of years fighting one another and bowing down to idols. No such cause accounts for the superiority of Assyria, Phrygia, Ionia, or Egypt. A few pale philosophers sustain the literature of the world, and advance civilization.

Persian literature would hav improved us more than Jewish fables, but the contact of Hebrews with the Roman empire decided this question.

Forces are trying to arrange themselvs around central points of organization in the United States, and we can influence that matter. Leibnitz says that "if all atoms had clear perceptions, we should be angels." But atoms are gregarious in a cell, and so are men in a political crowd. Get the right one for the rostrum, to interpret and guide, and all will be well. A cell would be nothing unless nucleated, and nothing prospers left at loose ends.

Some say that office-seekers alone can reform the government, they having the "strongest motivs." A pestilence has still more decided proclivities, and makes havoc with the noble march of healthful forces.

Since reforms occupy a large share of public attention, if great statesmen fail to secure order in the land, men and women could hardly expect a ghost or God to regulate human affairs, when his neglect, and the very thought of him, hav driven so many to desperation and suicide, causing others to murder their loved ones in a fit of religious frenzy.

Some say that liberty is consistent only with a regard for law. The laws of morality are patent to every human heart; the personality styled God must also conform to their influence. They should be calmly stated in public, and explained by those great men (not Hamilton, who favored a "consensus of the competent") who respect the noble judgment of the people.

The fiends of ecclesiastical intrigue who forget that the masses are the only rightful rulers of the country, should be closely watched. They promulgate the dicta of questionable secret societies. They favor for their own interest many arbitrary rules not built on true public principles. Such rules would convince us that some man, or some day, is sacred. And such foolish ideas, like swarms of flies of Egypt, make our moral atmosphere loathsome and unbearable, ruining our country and our peace forever, poisoning the very holiness of heaven, which religionists pretend to love. No measure should be adopted by the government unless ratified simultaneously by the whole people in some way.

Mr. Potts will consider that there is no arguing against facts. Geology proves that fish-lizards and fish-serpents existed in the early ages of the world, as well as imperfectly formed fishes. We hav not such now. Nature's power is sufficient to form wings, lungs, or eyes, when needed, as well as a monkey with an immense tail and a head like an apple.

ALHAZA.

NEW CAMBRIA, KAN., May 17, 289.

MR. EDITOR: One reason that the Christians oppose free speech and free press is, as they say, that "if it were not for corrupting the morals of their children, as far as they were individually concerned they would not care." They are great sticklers for originality, while this charge is as old as the time when Socrates was forced to drink the deadly hemlock for corrupting the morals of youth. Yet it is well known to-day that he was one among the grandest moral teachers that ever lived. So it is easily seen how badly mistaken one can be by taking up the hue and cry of the ignorance of past ages and directing it at present reformers. Now, I would be pleased to hav them answer wherein the Infidels of this country or any other are teaching immorality. It is true that we oppose the Bible, which the Christian takes for his moral guide; and if we fail to show its teachings to be immoral then the charge is sustained, but if we succeed then we hav a right to accuse them of ignorance, bigotry, and intolerance, and taking up old sayings of tyrants, parrot-like, and palming them off as their reasons for opposing Infidelity. While, on the other hand, if we should fail to show the Bible to be an immoral book, and yet should ourselvs teach nothing immoral, we fail to see wherein the above charge is true. The most that could be said would be that we were teaching a system of morality of very recent date, which is better suited to this age than the old superannuated system that was taught away back when the human race was in the cradle of ignorance.

Now we will giv the moral examples of the old patriarchs of the Bible: Abraham married his half sister. Isaac married his second cousin. He was a dissembler and a liar. He said, "Rebeccah is my sister," as did Abraham, his father. Jacob married his cousins, Leah and Rachel. Taking the genealogy of Jacob in connection with Prof. O. S. Fowler's "Sexual Science," he must hav been an idiot. Jacob stole his brother's blessing and lied to his father; also he swindled his father-in-law. Moses's father married his aunt. Righteous Lot committed incest with his daughters. David put Uriah in the forefront of battle and got him killed and then took his wife. A savage could not do worse. He was a barbarian and a libertin. We will pass over Abraham's incestuous marriage and his taking another wife, Keturah, and the way he treated Hagar, his handmaid; and also Moses's way of treating captivs and his killing the Egyptian, burying him in the sand, and lying, and fleeing the country. Also David's mode of dealing with prisoners and his eighteen or twenty wives. The same with Solomon's numerous wives and concubines, since the "new dispensation has done away with this"—that is, the Edmunds bill. Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, David, and Solomon are held up as exemplary characters throughout Christendom to-day, and if they lived and practiced the same habits they would be in the penitentiary or on the gallows. And should the rising generation follow their example, where would our "social, moral and governmental fabric" be?

JOHN W. ABBOTT.

GRANADA, COL., June 29, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Was it old Moses, or Mr. Paul, late of Palestina, that contributed to the "Theological Fables," called Bible, the statement that the Lord is no respecter of persons? Certainly, so it seems to be. I wrote you before how we spent all our spare shekels and built a useless gospel-shop, instead of investing the same shekels in building an irrigating canal about ten miles long, and making this beautiful Arkansas valley in eastern Colorado blossom as the rose. But it seems the Lord is no respecter of persons. The gospel-bangers when they collected our shekels promised us an abundance of Lord's blessings, but they lied, since we sacrificed our shekels and built the Lord a temple, and old Jehovah did not keep his promises, that his agents, the gospel-drummers, made. This our great drouth at present proves, and peace and good will among his favorit customers do not exist. One of our shining female lights among other children had two sons, one of whom drew a pistol on the school-teacher and was going to make a sieve out of him for some imaginary strict rule. The elder son robbed the old man of nearly $1,000 and courted some of the pretty girls in a doubtful manner before he went to Indian Territory. Well, the next sensation was when the leading Sunday-school dude offered a doctress $10 to relieve one of his Sunday-school harem of the results of not keeping the Seventh Commandment. The other day a lady of the Lord's host, when talking to her husband about the good for humanity and civilization that will result from opening Indian Territory, asked me if I did not think that the Lord did not want the Indians to become civilized, or else he would hav made them more civilized. I answered that there seems to be a great deal of truth in it. In looking over the history of the world, I always found that where people and nations were extremely saturated with the Lord's influence, they cut one another's throats by incessant wars, burnt and hanged our grandmothers for witches, tortured our fathers and relativs on the rack and gibbet, and in a hundred ways made human life a curse. As the Lord is no respecter of persons, our gospel-bangers do not fatten in an abundance of this world's goods. Last year the Lord sent us a gospel-drummer, on whose phrenological development people commented with a great deal of sacrilegious remark. Well, the missionary board soon noticed the necessity of sending us stronger timber, but the next parson that tried his game fared no better. Before he labored here for the Lord three months his better half took in boarders to keep the wolf from the door. Soon after, the poor parson left in disgust, went to New York to work on his widowed mother's farm, and let us poor devils go to the dogs for preaching. The fact is, the people are too good and too sensible to need any preachers. The last Colorado legislature stole quite a lot of money from the taxpayers and gave it to preachers to say prayers and appeal to the good Lord (whose favorits were King David and Lot and his gals) to guide their intelligence. Lo, what is the result? Why, that same legislature divided about a dozen counties, and every new county was named after some noted squaw fornicator. It won't do to appeal for guidance to a Lord who found most delight in the doings of old David and Lot. Well, in closing my remarks, I will add that we are blessed again with a gospel-pounder—a poor farmer, who is mistaking his calling in starting preaching gospel, when nature did adapt him more to work between the shafts of a wheelbarrow in his barnyard at home. Last Sunday the poor ignorant man preached that Colonel Ingersoll's daughters were converted to Christ and him crucified.

MR. EDITOR: Through the kindness of an old friend, a subscriber to your paper, I hav been afforded the opportunity of perusing a few copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER of recent date. Born and reared a Protestant, it has required years of patient investigation to disabuse my mind of the fallacies of early education. When a mere child I was forced to attend that cradle of religious bigotry, the Sunday-school, and being at that time blessed with a retentiv memory, was induced to compete for a prize offered to the scholar in my class who should recite the greatest number of verses in the New Testament. This prize, a cheap book, I captured by reciting over five hundred verses in one session, distancing all competitors more than halfway. I was then only in my eighth year, and even at that tender age there were many things encountered in the Bible so apparently inconsistent as to provoke numerous questions, which as a rule met with the stereotyped answer, "You are too young to understand these things. Wait until you are older and they will be made plain to you."

Well, I hav waited until the storms of more than threescore years hav whitened my once auburn locks, and am still waiting for a second Solomon to enlighten my benighted understanding. I hav conversed with some of the brightest lights in the ministerial firmament on the subject of Bible contradictions, but hav never met one who could explain them without doing violence to the rules of language and the laws of common sense. One of the great stumbling-blocks of my youthful days was the doctrin of the trinity, or three gods in one. Now, I could readily comprehend the truth of the theory of the old Dutchman who said to his son engaged in killing a snake, "Look oud, Yawcob, for vere ders two ders alvays von schnake." What he meant was that where there is one snake there is two. His mistakenly stated hypothesis was true, and he "builded better than he knew." But how God the father could be God the son and God the holy ghost at one and the same time without a tadpole-and-bullfrog transformation in which the identity of the primary is lost in the construction of its successor, I was, and am yet, unable to comprehend.

I was told that this was a question solvable only by infinity. Then tell me, please, said I, what is the use in giving infinit law to a finite being? The answer to this was, "'Tis one of the mysteries of godliness." Now, this same book called the Bible, which the Christian world cling to (professedly) with deathlike tenacity, though they giv its moral precepts a wide berth in practice, teaches that "where there is no law there is no transgression." Then I ask all candid minds, What is the difference between no law and a law that the human mind cannot fathom? There is about as much consistency in requiring belief and obedience to such laws as there is in the Catholic clergy preaching Latin to a flannel-mouthed Irishman who doesn't know the difference between a Te Deum and "Tam O'Shanter."

There are possibly some good, honest people belonging to these so-called Christian churches, but church-membership has not made them either good or honest. They would be such were they outside, and perhaps better men and women, for they would be free from a corrupt ministry who seek refuge from manly toil by "stealing the livery of heaven to serve the devil in."

Nature has her inexorable laws, and it matters not whether they emanated from a supreme being who created the earth for man's habitation, and then created him and placed him thereon, or whether this earth and the laws of nature hav existed always, these laws cannot be violated without entailing the penalty. To my mind there is no difference between a belief that this earth has always existed and a belief that some supreme being has created it, "who is without beginning of days or end of time." Both are beyond the grasp of humanity. Geology, however, has demonstrated either that inspiration is a failure in regard to the earth's age, or that the knaves and fools who translated the Bible made a serious mistake.

In conclusion, let me say that if all the people would liv for the present by seeking out the truth and adopting the cardinal axiom of that execrated Infidel who said, "The world is my country and to do good my religion," the millions of suffering humanity would find release from poverty's bondage in this life, and the dispensers of charity would surely lose nothing in the age to come. HOSEA W. GROOM.

ADRIAN, MICH., June 28, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I must tell you of my experience with the famous revivalist, J. H. Weber. Last spring the Methodist minister of this city, Rev. C. H. Morgan, employed the above-named strolling evangelist to hold a series of revival meetings at the Broad street Methodist Episcopal church. He was a man of considerable magnetic force and a fluent and forcible speaker, and his success with old women and young children was something remarkable. The church was crowded at every meeting, and standing-room was at a premium. From the first meeting to the last he was ferocious and extremely bitter against the Infidels. There was no epithet in the English language that he did not make use of to vilify and abuse them. "Little, mean, contemptible, popgun" Infidels, are a few of the choice epithets he made use of against them. He challenged any Infidel to meet him, and boasted he could down the smartest one living in the extremely short space of two minutes.

I attended two or three of his meetings just for the sole purpose of hearing for myself what he had to say. In one of his sermons he held up a large Bible with the remark that every word in that book, from Genesis to Revelation, was literally true, and boastingly defied any Infidel to find one single contradiction or one false statement in the whole book. After hearing this, I concluded to try his mettle and find out, if possible, of what kind of material he was made. So I wrote him that I would accept his challenge he had so often repeated, and asked him to appoint a time and place to suit his own convenience, and to be sure and bring all the orthodox ministers he could find along with him. I also told him that the Bible alone would be the subject of discussion, and that no outside issues would be allowed or tolerated on any consideration. In order to be sure that he got the letter I sent it to his room in the Lawrence Hotel. He read the letter, and agreed to answer it. At his next meeting, that evening, he held up the letter before the audience with this cowardly harang: "Brethren, don't you believe that a poor, little, insignificant, blasphemous Infidel has challenged me to debate the truth and authenticity of the Bible? Does he think I would stoop so low as to debate that blessed book with an Infidel?" And this was the way this braggart evangelist downed an Infidel. The next morning I met this son of thunder on the street, accompanied by Pastor Morgan. I walked up to him and took him by the collar with the remark that he was the very man I was looking for. He asked who I was. I gave him my name, and you ought to hav seen how quick this valiant soldier of the cross dropped down on his knees and began to pray for the wicked Infidel. I asked him if this was the way he downed Infidels. He made no reply, but kept on praying. I waited until he had finished, and then I gave him some pretty plain talk. He did not seem at all disposed to talk back, which I very much regretted, as by that time there had gathered a large crowd of people, and I wanted an opportunity to show him up a little. But he got away on the double quick, and I lost my best chance. I must confess I was not at all surprised in the man, as all my experience with people of that class is that they are cowards as well as hypocrits.

Your editorial in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 29th on the alleged resurrection of Jesus, in reply to the Illinois lawyer G. W. Gere, is a splendid exposition of the many discrepancies and contradictions that abound in the so-called evangelical humbug called gospels. Mr. Kersey Graves in his "Sixteen Crucified Saviors" handles this, as well as all other questions appertaining to the story of the Judean Christ, in a very able manner. I hav sold some fifty copies of that excellent work. But for right-down sledgehammer style giv me Colonel Kelso's "Bible Analyzed." It is a scorcher and no mistake; as, in fact, all that comes from his pen is. His last book, "The Universe Analyzed," I hav read with much interest. P. B. REASONER.

WEST TROY, N. Y., June 20, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: The Bible itself, when carefully read, is unmistakable evidence of its own fiction and fraud. It shows itself the plan and work of a syndicate of conspirators, just emerging from a prehistoric state, to obtain power and rule over the masses. The masses then, as now in all heathen countries, had their various representativ deities. The object was to destroy all other so-called gods or deities by making one who, by reason of the attributes they gave him, would be their own over-ruling, supreme boss God, or Lord, or Jehovah. They took good care to hav themselvs named as agents and executors of the God they had made.

This, according to the chronology of the Bible, was about two thousand years after the genesis, but there is given a pretended account of these two thousand years. There is pretended to be given a full account of creation down to the time of Moses, when he and Aaron and Joshua and David and Solomon, and other monsters and mountebanks, went on writing a Bible, the most stupendous curse that ever afflicted the human race. Thus was produced a volume of eighty books for a government of a man-made God; a God whose first grandchild was a murderer; a God that would get mad and swear; a God who destroyed cities of men, women, and children with fire and brimstone from heaven; a God who drowned the world; a God who sent bears out of the woods to destroy children; a God who ordered a people to murder a neighboring people and take all their property, or destroy what they could not carry away; a perfidious God who promised the building of the temple to David and then gave the job to Solomon, and promised the crossing over Jordan into the promised land to Moses, but broke the contract and gave it to Joshua.

Thus, this Bible God worried and strove with his children, creating and killing for four thousand years, when he gave up the work in despair and passion, and killed a silly, eccentric young man named Jesus for no conceivable reason except jealousy of supernatural prerogativs. There is no doubt Jesus was too previous in pretending to supernatural authority, but he was ignorant and could not read the Bible to find that he was infringing on the royalty of miracles held by a supreme, supernatural, versatil, angry, and jealous God.

But no matter. God killed Jesus, and an interregnum in supernatural government seemed to prevail, opening an opportunity for a new set of God-makers. Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, etc., stepped into the shoes of Moses, Aaron, David, Solomon, etc., and made a new God and Bible. They made their second God of a boy born of a virgin grass widow, who said a tramp calling himself an angel told her she would hav a child who would be a wonderful man. She had the child, who had many eccentricities, similar to Joe Smith the Mormon. His many tricks commended him for the figure for a new God made to order, for the purpose of effecting the object of the betrayal of the Jewish Palestine, and merging it into the Roman empire. It was a political conspiracy for which he was justly put to death.

St. Paul understood it when he literally quoted the words of the eminently notorious Cato of Rome, when he was urging a law condemning money, jewelry, and ornaments of women into the government treasury, and also restricting them to a state of servitude, obedience, and humility. The words as well as the sentiments of Paul, the great traitor conspirator, as in the Bible, and those of the Roman pagan Cato, were duplicates. Paul was the Moses of the new religion, though he lost his life by the people he was trying to corrupt, as Moses failed to cross the Jordan. His aspiration was empire and power. Augustus, seeing the wide-spread disaffection by Paul's preaching and writing, embraced or tolerated Christianity as an auxiliary to his prerogativs, and became the first pagan pope. Then the bloody code of Christianity and despotic rule of Rome became congenial, and the flood-gates of hell were hoisted, and flooded Europe for over one thousand years, or until after the days of the heroic Luther.

And yet if the Bible and Bible's God be accepted, the Catholic church is the only true orthodox church. They hold to faith and say that a dose of salvation, or St. Jacob's Oil, will make the soul safe. Such is the way to make superstitious fools.

We would not destroy the church buildings, but tear out the pulpits and lock out the preachers, and turn the buildings into schools and colleges of learning—Secular and scientific. We must approximate this as fast as possible, to get over the ragged edge of the Dark Ages of Christianity.

There is but little difference between the Catholic and the Mormon church of to-day. They are both in accord with the Bible for despotic rule.

About thirty years ago the writer—a Freethinker—was a member of a Kansas organization, so called, of New York state. It was to prevent the then territory of Kansas from becoming a slave state when admitted into the Union. We were aided as well as opposed by so-called Christians. One Presbyterian minister left his church here and went South, where he lingered and died while Kansas crowned herself with a free constitution, and stepped into the Union in 1859.

But slavery and despotism still linger in Kansas. In May, 1886, I received a paper from Kansas City giving a detailed account of a cyclone in that city on May 11th. A large amount of property was destroyed. One school-house was wrecked in which fourteen children were killed, and many more badly injured. At the funeral the clergy put in their appearance to defend their client. They owned that it was God, as no assassins could be charged. It was their only plea. After plastering him all over with blarney and soft soap, they said God, a kind, loving father, took this method to get these children to himself that they might be free from this wicked world, and hav longer time to worship him in heaven.

There is but little if any difference between the barbarian slavedriver, who gets his living by the use of the lash, and the preacher who does the same by the use of superstition and fraud, with the prayer, "Lord, giv us this day our daily bread," while his dupes are feeding him. And so with their Sunday-schools, which are as destructiv to youthful intellect as the cheap novel-reading trash that floods our land.

M. MCGOWEN.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., July 25, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Thanking you for your endeavor in your editorial on "Life," in compliance with my wish, to throw all the light possible on a difficult problem, and assuming that you will hardly differ with me in this, that the subject will bear further investigation; I beg the opportunity of presenting some additional thoughts on some of the phases of the subject which the discussion brings out—not as a criticism, but on the assumption that there may be two sides to the question.

In Mr. Heston's admirable and significant grouping of gems he has pictured the one typical of truth as the largest. It is a beautiful conception. In an allegory, "A Search for Truth," page 258, April 27th, I find this: "I hav sought truth for many long years, but hav not found her. I hav not rested, I hav not repined, and I hav not seen her." This, and all, is nice and beautiful. Will the lady allow me to present thanks for the pleasure enjoyed in its perusal? So many imagin they hav found the truth and are happy! It is illusory, and ends with disappointment. Collect all the tears and blood that hav been shed in the propagation of untruth, the one would make an ocean and the other would crimson its waters. Few, comparativly, hav been much annoyed with what they actually know, but that which is not and can not be known has been a burden to humanity.

You say:

> We take it for granted that our friend is a believer in those principles of evolution in accordance with which, when the simplest living bodies are thus produced, they may develop into the highest known complexity of organization.

I do not undervalue scientific research, but place as high an estimate on a truth proved as anyone can. But I care little for what the so-called scientists may guess or suppose. As to a theory, they should hav no use for one, and they hav no right to hav one. On that only which is true, and proved as such, are they justified in expressing an opinion. They are the last ones that should claim, or be accorded, a privilege in guessing. And when they do guess they are entitled to no more respect or consideration than I would be in saying I could build a steamship from a rainbow, or make an Atlantic cable from a spider's web.

In reference to your quotations from Haeckel and others, I would say: It is difficult to understand, if all the solid matter that the earth is now composed of was once in a gaseous state, what attractiv force or power could hold it together and keep it in place. There are some things not yet made plain in relation to the nebulous theory.

It is a notable fact that all the theories as to the beginning of matter, also of life, are suppositions. Therefore no fact in relation to those things can be demonstrated, because there is no basis.

Many books hav been written assuming that something must hav been evolved from nothing. It is clear that a mountain, or the earth, could hav been formed by the accumulation of atoms. But when and where did these atoms hav a beginning?

Life, if ever spontaneous, would be so now. A German naturalist, Eherenberg, claims to hav discovered 722 living species of what he calls infusoria that swarm in the fluids of living and healthy animals. He estimates that 500,000,000 sometimes exist in a drop of water, and that it would take twice that number to make a mass as large as a grain of sand. The figures are appalling. Omit fifty or seventy per cent; enough remains for argument's sake. "They hav mouths, teeth, stomachs, muscles, nerves, eyes, and organs of reproduction; and in their mode of reproduction they are viviparous, oviparous, and gemmiferous." All this he saw with the aid of a powerful microscope. (American Journal of Science, vol. 35, p. 372.) On the supposition that his eyes and other faculties were in a healthy condition, and that nothing was illusory, it is pretty good evidence that in those smallest of living animals life is transmitted and continued the same as in all other animals.

I think this fact, that even these animalcules are continued by uninterrupted sexual propagation instead of arising spontaneously, ought to be accepted as a stronger argument against the spontaneous theory than all that has been produced in its favor.

Brother Jasper says "the sun do move," and to him it is a logical conclusion, the only one he can arrive at using his eyes and senses in the same way as when looking and meditating on surrounding objects. If there is anything that we do know, not all illusory, it does appear to be this, that life with humanity is not spontaneous.

If from out of nerveless, senseless matter life did evolve spontaneously, with all that pertains to living animals, nerves, muscles, bones, hearts, lungs, reproductiv organs, some would think the last evolution might as well hav been omitted.

What the necessity of sex? Only making the whole more complex; doubling the liability to obstructions, to get out of order, run down, etc. All life is double, and neither in the vegetable nor in the animal world can it be evolved independent of sex and an intermingling of the life germ. Dependent, we will say, on conditions, birds are evolved from eggs, but without the birds eggs are a total failure.

Do higher forms invariably evolve from lower? Can it be proved that it never works the opposit? If man is an evolution from some lower order, and such still exists, why hav they not become men? That would appear to be in harmony with the theory of the survival of the fittest. There is something a little obscure about that. Change the places respectivly of a crocodile from the Nile and a polar bear from the Arctic ocean; neither survive. There would be the same reason, and as much, in saying that the mastodon's life was spontaneous as in saying that that of the infusoria was. It will be the same with them as with the mastodons; when the last is gone, dead, there will be no more. And when the last man has passed over and beyond, if that should ever be, that is the end. In all time there will not be another. J. VAN DENBURGH.

The Cuyahoga Hills.

On the golden hills of long ago
Where the summer pictures bloom and go,
Where the Cuyahoga's flashing waves
Sing crooning song o'er the Indian graves;
And the marsh winds moan o'er berries red
Where the massasauga* hides its head;
And the coral sprays of wintergreen
Creep over the banks of mossy sheen;
There the dogwood cups of dainty white
Were lamps to lure our homeward flight;
And I saw to-day near the brook's mad flow
Footprints like ours in the long ago.

The morning dews from the tamaracks weep
Where the Indian hunters lie asleep,
And the sweet birds sing through summer days
As they sang upon our gipsy ways;
While the bumble-bee, with legs of gold,
Is down in the clover's deepest fold,
The chipmunk hears the startling shout
Of the free, wild boy when school is out.
As the world danced by in the mask of June
He pines all the drowsy afternoon
Like a 'prisoned savage, small and brown,
Where the Cuyahoga mists come down.

Oh! the skies were fair and the music low
That fell on the hills of long ago,
And memory murmurs in her dreams
Of the blue lake Erie's burdened streams;
There, out of the reach of you and me,
The fruit was red in the cucumber tree,
And the poplar blossoms free to blow
O'er the longing urchins far below,
Who turning away from forest glooms
Found shelter and song 'neath cherry blooms.
O starry temple! what sweet winds heard
Your songs of childhood, bee, and bird!

But crimson fruit and tempting flowers,
We dream of them now in these after hours,
Where oft on a weary bed of pain
We hear the drip of the summer rain
In its soothing flow like tender tunes
While the days swing past with merry Junes;
While we in our dreams as children play
The crutch with the sad years thrown away.
The spirit of youth is hov'ring low,
And we liv on the hills of long ago,
Where the Cuyahoga's silver wave
Sings o'er the bed of the Indian brave.

Baby Has Gone to School.

The baby has gone to school; ah me!
What will the mother do,
With never a call to button or pin,
Or tie a little shoe?
How can she keep herself busy all day,
With the little "hindering thing" away?

Another basket to fill with lunch,
Another "good-bye" to say,
And the mother stands at the door to see
Her baby march away;
And turns with a sigh that is half relief,
And half a something akin to grief.

She thinks of a possible future morn,
When the children, one by one,
Will go from their home out into the world,
To battle with life alone.
And not even the baby be left to cheer
The desolate home of that future year.

She picks up garments here and there,
Thrown down in careless haste;
And tries to think how it would seem
If nothing were displaced;
If the house were always as still as this,
How could she bear the loneliness?

The Little Red Calf.

To begin with, old Daisy, cow, had a calf, and there never was such a wonderful little bossy in all the annals of the farm. And so pretty, too! a rich dark red in color, with a white star in her forehead. And so gentle! Why, even the three-year-old dared to pet her.

But one sad day big brother came in and said: "The butcher is coming after the calf to-morrow. Pa will get $5 for it."

And then what a wailing arose among the children! It really was too bad, and they ran to tell big sister about it. She was hulling strawberries and gave them each one, but even that could not make them feel better.

"Well," said sister finally, "sit down, and I'll tell you a story about a little calf that I once knew of. It was a red calf."

"Like ours?" asked one.

"Yes, and it had a white star——"

"A white star, too, mamma?" said another.

"And this little calf was taken away by the butcher and killed, and they skinned it and took it to the market.

"Now, in that town was a little girl who had been very sick and could only eat real nice tender meat, and the doctor said: 'Go to the market, and see if you can't get a little veal for her.' So the little girl's papa went to the market and said to the butcher: 'Hav you any veal in to-day?' And the butcher answered: 'Yes. Here is some that is about as plump and tender as you often see.' So the little girl's papa bought some and took it home."

"What's veal got to do with a calf story?" asked eight-year-old.

"Oh!" said sister, "the meat of a calf is called 'veal,' just as we call pigs 'pork.'"

"Oh, yes!" said eight-year-old, blinking.

"The veal was just what the little girl needed, and she soon got well; but long before she did the rest of the veal had been sold. A sick boy had a little of it and so did an old, old lady.

"Now, that same day Grandma Brown was getting ready to make cheese; she had her milk all ready when she said, suddenly:

"'There now, I havn't a bit of rennet left, and it is ten to one I won't find any if I go to the market for it, but it's all I can do.'

"Then she went to the same butcher and said: 'Hav you killed a calf to-day? I want some rennet.'

"'Yes,' said the butcher. 'We killed one this morning, and you can hav half of the stomach; my wife wants the rest.'

"'Well, I'm glad to get that much,' she said, smiling.

"So she took it home and washed it and put a piece into her milk, and dried the rest and put it away for another time."

"What'd she do that for?" asked eleven-year-old, who had strayed in and heard this part of the story.

"Why, you know when we make 'Dutch' cheese we use thick, sour milk.

"But she was making cheeee such as we buy, and the rennet thickens the milk while it is yet sweet.

"Well, there was a man that took some of the bones and ground them for his chickens, and the skin was turned and made into shoes for the poor little Johnstown children, so you see the calf was all used up for very good purposes."

"Do you s'pose our calf went that way?" asked all the children at once.

"Yes, I shouldn't wonder."

"Are there any more berries for us?"

"No, not this time. Now run outdoors."

So away they all went, fully comforted for the loss of the calf. MAE R. STREETER.

FRENCHTOWN, NEB., July 10, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I went back to Illinois last year to go to school, but I came back again this spring. I like to ride the horses and liv on a farm. We hav one little kitten and three old cats. My mother died in Texas, nine years ago. My sister and I are going to keep house for our father in a week or two.

Good bye. From,

MARCELLUS, MICH., June 28, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I send you with this a little story that I thought perhaps you would hav printed in the Children's Corner of THE TRUTH SEEKER. My own brothers and sisters were pleased with the story, and I would like to hav it printed, if it will please the children. If you don't hav it printed, I shall not be offended, for I hav no very great faith in my own literary abilities.

I hav read THE TRUTH SEEKER ever since I could read, and now, at the age of nineteen, I think I can truthfully declare myself an honest Agnostic.

And I remain,
Your friend and admirer,
MAE R. STREETER.

[The story is a sensible and instructiv one. We are all much obliged for your kindness, and will always be pleased to hear from our new Agnostic friend.—ED. C. C.]

FRENCHTOWN, NEB., June 28, 1889.

MY DEAR MISS WIXON: I am almost afraid the poem I inclose is too long and too prosy. It is not near as nice as I intended it to be. It is often so in this life, I believe, that the real does not come up to the ideal. But you can judge of its merits, if it has any. You published the last I sent you beautifully. At least, I giv you the credit of it, for the Children's Corner is yours—and are you not proud of it? You should be, if you are not.

My niece has written a short letter and drawn a picture of a wild horse for you. We imagin her drawing shows considerable genius.

I recently received a copy of the new "Cosmian Hymn Book" from Mr. Washburn. In an article in THE TRUTH SEEKER from John P. Guild I saw my poem had been accepted, but never expected to get a copy of the book, as times here are so bad; everything we hav to sell so cheap and that which we buy so dear. I was very glad to see your beautiful songs, "Truth Shall Make You Free" and "Our Darling." Both are fine, but especially the latter, which is enough to melt a heart of stone. I think Mr. Washburn has made a splendid collection, and I am proud of him, and all our noble, Freethinking women.

I hav mailed to your address the Woman's Tribune, published at Beatrice, Neb., and hope you will like it. You will find a poem of mine, "Centennial Bells."

Ever yours, MARY BAIRD FINCH.

[We are indeed proud of our Children's Corner, and proud of our noble band of helpers. Without their aid and friendship we could do little. Among our valued friends we prize highly the gifted poetess of the West, whose sweet songs are always welcome.—ED. C. C.]

CANON CITY, COL., June 24, 289.

DEAR MISS WIXON: We are having very pleasant weather here. The prospect for fruit is good. The more tender varieties are fuller than usual.

Spring opened quite early, but cooler weather and rain succeeded. Canon is noted for fruit-growing. Our fruit was buried in snow in April and escaped uninjured. I like the climate and scenery of Canon very much. We hav mountains rearing their tall peaks on all sides.

Although in many respects a pleasant town, Canon City is literally snowed under with churches, ministers, and their attendant societies, producing the usual crop of superstition, bigotry, and prejudice. Although the churches are protected at public expense, and Liberal meetings are conducted with as much and, in many cases more, decorum than Christian meetings, yet one of these churches could no more be had for a Liberal meeting than heaven could be had for a pig pasture. This is the way they observe the Golden Rule. It is a sample of their honor.

They certainly know it would be galling to them to pay taxes on our institutions, no less obnoxious to them than are the churches to us. Such is Christian consistency. Liberalism or, as it is commonly known here, Infidelity, is looked upon as a crime.

My folks sometimes laugh at me about the saying of an aged (it is impolite to say old) bachelor. He said, "Orella would be a good girl but for that Infidelity." In my judgment, if there is any responsibility it is further back. Our organizations are not adapted to think alike, and more than that, the world is advancing.

Some of our Christian neighbors are already attributing the destruction of Johnstown, Pa., to their God. What inconsistency and what abuse of that God which, in the last sentence, they hav represented as being so good!

About two months ago Mr. Bell kindly stopped and gave one rousing lecture which, perhaps, partly drew the veil of superstition from the eyes of some of the people of Canon. He stopped with us while here. We enjoyed his visit very much, and will be glad to welcome him on his return. He has promised to giv us a call.

Our school is out. We had recitations the last day, and there were some religious pieces spoken. Mine came in good place after their appeals to their God—S. P. Putnam's "Why Don't He Lend a Hand?" There were about fifty visitors, some very religious, one Baptist minister. The teacher was requested to apologize for my recitation, but politely refused to do so. During one of the revivals last winter there was an evangelist here, Rev. A. Clay Yates, of Missouri. My brother Orion went one night to hear him. During the meeting Rev. Yates went about talking to the congregation. He finally commenced questioning brother, asked him if he was a Christian, etc. He replied he was not. He then asked him if he knew of anyone better than Jesus. He replied that he did, and said, Colonel Ingersoll. The reverend gentleman stepped back in perfect astonishment and said, "You are a numskull [and pointing to Orion's head]. I knew when I saw that thing there was nothing in it." Pa criticised the reverend gentleman quite severely through one of the city papers, without any reply. Some of the Christians said he served him just right, one in particular complimenting him very highly.

My letter is already too long, but I must tell you two incidents before closing. Last winter one of my schoolmates, a wild school girl and unbeliever, had a class in Sunday, school. It was a juvenil class, as in many respects all of them necessarily are. The subject was the sacrament. The class was called upon to know if anyone could explain the sacrament. One little boy got up and commenced: "The sacrament is a dinner where one member passes around some little cakes and"—(up jumped a little girl and said)—"an' do they hav jelly on 'em?"

On another occasion a friend was talking with a little Christian girl on the subject of the oath. He told her she did not know how to swear. She replied that she did, to prove which she recited this instance: "I was telling my sister of having seen a snake. Sister disputed it and replied, 'Can you hold up your right hand and swear that you saw a snake?' Said I [holding up her right hand and showing how she did], 'God—damn—it, I saw a snake.'" It seems that Christians do not hav confidence enough in each other or in themselvs to think they can tell the truth without the assistance of their God. I must close, wishing success to all truth seekers. Good-bye. Very truly, ORELLA LOOKE.

THE STRUGGLE
FOR
Religious and Political Liberty.
In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

Poetry.

Dryden's Opinions.

The common cry is o'er religion's test;
The Turk's is at Constantinople best;
Idols in India, popery at Rome;
And our own worship only true at home.
And true but for the time: 'tis hard to know
How long we please it shall continue so;
This side to-day, and that to-morrow burns;
So all are God almighty in their turns.

Priests of all religions are the same.
Of whatsoe'er descent their godhead be,
Stone, stock, or other homely pedigree,
In his defense his servants are as bold
As if he had been born of beaten gold.
For 'tis their duty, all the learned think,
To espouse his cause by whom they eat and drink.

By education most hav been misled;
They so believe, because they were so bred;
The priest continues what the nurse began,
And so the child imposes on the man,

The Beginning.

Millions of years of waters slow subsiding,
Millions of years of glaciers, pushing, sliding;
Ages to form the limestone and the granit,
Cycles of time to lay the soil upon it.

A ray of sunlight pierced a sheltered hollow,
Earth thrilled with joy her beauty to disclose;
All else was there, the sun's ray did its duty;
And lo! a rose. —Unity.

Literary Notices.

Clinton Roosevelt, New York city, has published a pamphlet entitled, "Principia of Social Science." It deals with the broadest principles of social science, setting forth what its author regards as the true ones.

"The Money Famin, and a Few Other Reasons Why the People are so Poor," by C. A. Blodgett, and published by Fowler & Wells, New York, exposes the financial cheats of corrupt capitalists and politicians.

"Against Socialism," by "Humanitas," and published by the Freethought Publishing Company, London, is a five-cent pamphlet whose nature is indicated by its title. It will be of use to those interested in the labor question.

Freethinkers having Christian neighbors who esteem their church for its alleged forwarding of temperance, may procure a book showing that Christianity has promoted drunkenness, in D. R. Unkard's "An Aged Sin." It is published at Pittsburgh, Pa., by R. Staley & Co.

The Lucifer Publishing Company, Valley Falls, Kan., publish a book by Rachel Campbell advocating reforms in relation to marriage, based on the principles known to be held by that company. The name is, "The Prodigal Daughter; or, The Price of Virtue." Price, 10 cents.

J. A. Edgerton, Plantville, O., is doing good work by publishing a small volume of "Poems," in part devoted to assailing the Christian superstitions. He seems, however, to retain a belief in the Deists' God; and his attachment to that God, and also his high tone of earnest moral feeling, will ease the way of the book into a Christian family.

O. J. Smith, 32 Vesey street, New York, publishes a pamphlet, "Is All Well With Us?" which essays to prove the need of reforms in the structure of our government, such as limiting the president's power, and rendering governmental action more directly and simply the expression of the people's decision, as it is said to be in England.

"God. Being also a brief Statement of Arguments against Agnosticism," by "Humanitas," and published by the Freethought Publishing Company, London. This work is a thoroughgoing Atheistic one, and endeavors to destroy the position of the Christian, the Infidel Deist, and last the Agnostic. Pages, 66; price, 25 cents. The portion against Agnosticism is also published separately; price, 10 cents.

Belford's Magazine is attaining popularity, and deserves it. It is full of radical criticism of public affairs of the day, especially political errors and corrupt doings. It is what Americans need to open their eyes to the public wrongs that schemers will continually fasten upon people who do not maintain that eternal vigilance which is the price of liberty. In the July number, besides valuable treatments of national affairs, we notice an amusing sketch, "Mr. Walk-a-leg Adams 'meets up with' a Tartar," by A. C. Smart, that we feel inclined to award especial commendation. The article, "The Lady of the Club," by our old friend Helen H. Gardener, we transfer to our columns. Belford's is a large and handsome publication, but the price is only $2.50 a year, 25 cents a number.

"The Coming Freeman; or, Justice and Equality to All," by John King, Cincinnati, is a good book. It presents in a plain, practical way the doctrins of thorough-going democracy, government by and for the people. It shows how they hav been departed from more or less by corrupt men and groups of men in both the Republican and Democratic parties, and how we should remedy the matter. It favors labor reform. Price, 50 cents.

J. L. Gebhart, M. D., of Hot Springs, Ark., publishes a readable book entitled, "An Allegory, Illustrating the difficulties to the development and acceptance of religion and science by the human race." He here uses the word "religion" in a higher sense than that in which it denotes superstition, as in the case of Christianity. The production is of much the same nature as "The Search for Truth," by Olive Schreiner, recently given by us. The pages number 38; price, perhaps 10 cents.

The Theosophical Book Company, of Boston, publish a 68-page book called, "Light on the Path: A Treatis for the Personal Use of Those Who are Ignorant of the Eastern Wisdom, and Who Desire to Enter Within Its Influence." We do not desire to enter within the influence of the Eastern wisdom. Christ's was Eastern wisdom, and it ruined the world for centuries. This Eastern mysticism diverts attention from the actual felt objects and affairs of life, which are the only means by which we can better our condition. The price of the book is probably 25 cents.

The Modern Science Essayist is the name given a series of little books issued monthly, each containing a treatment of some problem of science or evolution instructiv to Rationalists. No. 7 is "The Descent of Man," by E. D. Cope, Ph.D. The evolution of man's physical structure from lower animals, and also the evolution of his intellectual and moral faculties, are dealt with. We present a few scattered paragraphs:

I must call your attention to the fact that the human structure is not made for an upright being at all: it is made for a quadruped. The arrangement and suspension of certain of the internal organs in man, and especially in woman, is such that they are perfectly adapted to a quadruped. If a human being had made man as he is, we should hav said that he did not know what he was about. The diseases from which the fair sex suffer are to a considerable extent due to the fact that the organs of the pelvis were intended for a being walking on four feet. We hav not yet adapted ourselvs to the upright position.

Then again, in the quadruped, the valves in the arteries and veins are so arranged that a perfect circulation of the blood is induced. Along the back, which is longitudinal, the force of gravity is sufficient to keep the blood in its proper channels. There is no need of valves, and there are none. But in man, who stands erect, and does need them, there are none either. Elsewhere in the human body we find them where they ought not to be, and fail to find them where they ought to be. These imperfections of structure are the fertil causes of diseases in man. On the ground of intelligent design and manufacture, these things are not explainable; but on the ground of evolution, their significance is clear.

The progress of organic evolution has finally resulted in the development of a race capable of ethical action, and with hopes and longings after the ideal and the supreme. This points to a yet higher development and a superior race. The pointers are all in one direction in regard to the future of life and its functions.

The pressure of human society upon each individual is the origin of ethical intelligence, of the knowledge of the rights of others; while the social life and the family relation hav developed the benevolent sentiments and the affections. The combination of the knowledge of right and wrong with the benevolent sentiments constitutes the mainspring for ethical action, inspiring the doing of right and justice.

From the point of view of the biologist, as to the relation of mind to matter, we observe that mind everywhere manifests itself in correlation with material conditions, and we must conclude that mind is a property of the substance which exhibits it.

Also, intellectual and moral evolution are treated more at length in No. 8, "Evolution of the Mind," by Dr. Robt. Eccles. Some paragraphs are:

The mind—where is it, what is it, and whence came it? For ages men hav striven to solve these knotty problems. In studying the physical universe, we find that mocking nature played some solemn pranks which, if repeated in the psychical, will account for our tardiness of progress in this direction. Immediate perceptions of sense hav almost invariably been illusory. The earth seems flat and at rest, but is round and in rapid motion. The blue dome above looks like a solid arch studded with specks of light, but is in reality immense vacuity with myriads of giant globes. The sun appears to rotate round the earth, but the earth goes round the sun. It required centuries of thought to triumph over the deceptions of matter. It may require other centuries to overcome those of mind.

The mind never reaches perfect adjustment nor perfect truth; neither is it ever given over to total error. All its errors are partial truths, and all its truths partial errors. The new truth of the future is the synthesis of the partial truths of many errors of the past. Reconciliation is progress. Experiences which giv rise to narrow views are in time reinterpreted in the light of other experiences, and an expansion of the horizon of thought occurs. The growth is not from total error to perfect truth, but from a maximum to a minimum of error, and from a minimum to a maximum of truth.

In morality the same condition obtains. No creature, however low, is absolutely selfish, and none, however high, absolutely unselfish. Unselfishness is itself but transformed selfishness. We are kind and good to others because it is a greater pleasure to us to be so than it would be to pursue a course of selfishness. We relieve suffering and giv charity because, in doing so, we free ourselvs from sympathetic pain. In the sufferings of the past came our capacity for joy, in the struggles of the past our capacity to think. The pain and agony endured by our progenitors has attuned our systems to a thrill of pain at the sight of another's sufferings. On seeing a fellow-being suffer we mentally picture ourselvs in the same state. This evokes a quiver of pain in us that is an incessant impulse teaching mercy and leniency. To be cruel is to punish ourselvs. As every step of progress is taken toward greater definitness, this trait is likely to be a growing one, keeping pace with advancing civilization. Our minds will become keener in appreciating the sufferings of our fellows. This will highten our pain at another's agony, and increase our joy when able to relieve the same. Nature thus seems bound to lay upon us her lash for wrong-doing, until the race is willing to clasp hands as a common brotherhood.

When intellect has become fully wedded to unselfish love the ideal man will hav appeared. Then happiness will be at its maximum, and the soul-felt desires of millions of generations will hav been heard as prayers and answered as facts.

Price, 10 cents per number.

Our readers occasionally see in THE TRUTH SEEKER articles selected from the Popular Science Monthly. This is a magazine published by D. Appleton and Co., New York, at $5 a year, 50 cents a number. We could not giv too high commendation to its work in diffusing popular science, notably those principles of science that are specially effectiv in supplanting old theological beliefs. In the June number is an article from our champion Professor Huxley, and by way of hearing the other side too, a contribution from the Catholic polemicist W. H. Mallock, on "Cowardly Agnosticism." Dr. Andrew D. White, in his account of "Diabolism and Hysteria," records the later stages of the waning belief in possession by the devil. "Glaciers on the Pacific Coast" is the title of an illustrated sketch of some of our Alaskan scenery, by Prof. G. Frederick Wright. Another illustrated article is a fascinating description of "Toadstools and Mushrooms," by Prof. T. H. McBride; and still another is an account of "The Production of Beet Sugar," by Mr. A. H. Almy, embracing both the raising of the beets and the extraction of the sugar, an industry which the proposed factories of Claus Spreckels in California are likely to stimulate. "Fabulous Astronomy," by Prof. J. C. Houzeau, is a collection of curious beliefs about the sun, moon, Milky Way, and certain constellations. The article on "Christian Science," in the April number, seems to hav stirred up the believers in that doctrin, and a reply by Mr. Joshua F. Bailey is printed, under the title, "Is Christian Science a 'Craze?'" The magazine comes out in an editorial on "The Claims of 'Christian Science,'" denouncing this theory as one of those delusions which flourish among people who lack scientific training. The other editorial is also on a disputed subject, being a further discussion of Dr. Abbott's position on the "Devil Theory." "Mischief-Makers in Milk," by Alice B. Tweedy, is an appeal for careful protection of those who cannot speak for themselvs against dangers lurking in their usual food. An illustrated description of "The Animal World of Well-Waters" is given by Dr. Otto Zacharias. Edward H. Nicoll describes "The Chinook Language," used by the whites and the Indians on the northwest coast of America, much as "pidgin" English is employed in dealings between whites and Asiatics. The subject of the portrait and sketch this month is Prof. William G. Sumner, of Yale University, a vigorous and fearless worker in the field of social science. Correspondents discourse of "Agnosticism," "Christian Science," etc., and the other departments present their usual variety. We will subjoin two extracts from these contents:

Conscientious men still linger on who find comfort in holding fast to some shred of the old belief in diabolic possession. The sturdy declaration in the last century by John Wesley, that "giving up witchcraft is giving up the Bible," is echoed feebly in the latter half of this century by the eminent Catholic ecclesiastic in France who declares that "to deny possession by devils is to charge Jesus and his apostles with imposture," and asks, "How can the testimony of apostles, fathers of the church, and saints who saw the possessed and so declared, be denied?" And a still fainter echo lingers in Protestant England.

But, despite this conscientious opposition, science has in these latter days steadily wrought hand in hand with Christian charity in this field, to evolve a better future for humanity. The thoughtful physician and the devoted clergyman are now constantly seen working together; and it is not too much to expect that Satan, having been cast out of the insane asylums, will ere long disappear from monasteries and camp-meetings, even in the most unenlightened regions of Christendom (From Diabolism and Hysteria, by Dr. Andrew D. White).

The fact that such a baseless speculation as "Christian science" can find believers shows that what is referred to in our other editorial as the fancy of the multitude for theories which save them trouble and minister to their love of the marvelous has not yet disappeared from the world. The fascination for holding odd notions seems to be a weakness of the human mind which is hard to eradicate. Such beliefs hav been pretty well driven out of chemistry, physics, zoology, and other fields of science which can be searchingly investigated, and they remain only in psychology and medicin, dealing with the living human organism, which cannot be freely experimented upon. Human credulity has been greatly lessened by the march of scientific enlightenment, and what remains has taken on a new form. In earlier times it delighted in the supernatural, now it revels in its own false ideas of the natural. Then it trusted the revelations of self-appointed prophets, now it pins its faith to the slipshod reasoning of sham investigators. Science has done such wonderful things of late that a certain class of people, including many of excellent judgment in other fields, has come to believe any marvels put forth in its name. Hence we hav a modern class of mystery-mongers which will flourish until the spread of scientific culture has diffused the power of discriminating between science and base imitations of science (From the Editor's Table).

CHURCH HISTORY. By Professor Kurtz. Translated from latest edition, with approval of the author, by Rev. John MacPherson. A.M. In 3 vols. Vol. I. just issued. Cloth, 12mo, 574 pp. Price, $2. Funk & Wagnalls, 18 and 20 Astor place, New York.

This work was first published in 1849. It has passed through nine editions. Revised and improved at several different times by the author, it is now about twice its original size. The book has become the standard church history among English-speaking church people. While it was prepared especially to meet the requirements of a complete text-book for theological students, it is not without value for Liberal readers. Its arrangement of general divisions, sub-divisions, sections, and numbered paragraphs—using large type for the most important matter, and smaller type for minor details—conduces at once to simplicity and variety. It is free from acrimony and dogmatism, and seems to be dominated by the spirit of candor.

STUDIES IN THE OUTLYING FIELDS OF PSYCHIC SCIENCE. By Hudson Tuttle. 252 pages. Price, $1.25. New York: M. L. Holbrook & Co.

The author of this work professes to giv scientific and rational proofs of the doctrin of immortality. He recognizes the fact that we liv in an age of growing skepticism; that evidence which was once sufficient is no longer so, and that in the minds of a very large class of earnest and intelligent persons, faith in a future state of existence has a very slender hold. In his opinion it is the right and duty of this generation to place this doctrin on an enduring basis—a basis as solid as the Copernican system of astronomy. This, however, he says is not to be done by old methods, but new and modern ones suited to modern thought. The final chapter, containing the author's experience and intelligence from the "sphere of light," is graphic, and he most firmly believes settles the whole question in favor of a future life.

THE SPIES BRING OUT RAHAB AND HER KINDRED.

And the young men that were spies went in, and brought out Rahab, and her father, and her mother, and her brethren, and all that she had; and they brought out all her kindred, and left them without the camp of Israel.—Josh. vi, 23.

Odds and Ends.

LITTLE Elsie (witnessing a Fourth of July balloon ascension): "Oh, mamma, are those men going up to heaven?" Mother: "Hush, dear! Those are reporters."—Boston Herald.

HE (indignantly): "Those insulting church ushers put us into a back pew." She (calmly as a quiescent volcano): "They probably noticed that I wore a bonnet which I wouldn't care to hav seen."—New York Weekly.

VISITOR: "Your pastor seems to be a very earnest man. His voice trembled with emotion when he read the lesson this morning." Soprano: "Oh, it wasn't that; he had just had a row with the choir leader, and he was mad clear through."—Puck.

LITTLE girl: "If I should die and go to heaven would I hav wings?" Mamma: "Yes, my pet, and a crown and a harp." Little girl: "And candy?" Mamma: "No-o." Little girl (after meditation): "Well, I'm glad we've got a good doctor."

PHOTOGRAPHER: "My dear sir, can't you assume a more smiling countenance and throw off that jaded look?" Rev. V. V. Heighton: "Take me as I am. I need a vacation this summer, and these pictures are for distribution among my parishioners."—Life.

"AND now, little girls," said a Sabbath-school teacher, "you may tell me about the epistles." A little girl held up her hand. "Well," said the teacher. "The epistles," said the little girl, "the epistles are the wives of the apostles!"—United Presbyterian.

DEACON: "Do they use the revised edition of the Bible at your church, Mrs. Hymnal?" Mrs. Hymnal: "We used to do so, but since this craze for the antique began we did not wish to be behind the age, so we adopted the other book."—Lowell Citizen.

"THEY told me you were one of the famous praying pitchers of last season." (Modestly) "I was." "And did you always win when you offered up a prayer for victory previous to a game?" (With injured look) "Not always. Sometimes the other side bribed the umpire."

A MAN, last Sunday, was about to lay his hand upon the door of the church, when a little girl in the street said: "You can't get in there, mister." "Why," he said, "isn't this a church?" "Yes," said the little girl, "but the preacher has gone to Europe for six months, and taken God with him."—Detroit Tribune.

"MY friend," said a solemn man, "hav you ever done aught to make the community in which you liv the better for your living in it?" "I hav done much, sir," replied the other humbly, "to purify the homes of my fellow-beings." "Ah," continued the solemn man, with a pleased look, "you distribute tracts?" "No, I clean carpets."—Binghamton Republican.

A COUPLE of Texas sheep-raisers being in Austin went to church. On emerging from the sacred edifice one of them said: "I say, Bill, that preacher was hitting at us." "You bet he was. He didn't talk about nothing except lost sheep. Got yer pistol?" replied the other. "Why, certainly." "Then let's wait here till he comes out, and giv him a chance to explain what he meant by them personal remarks."—Texas Siftings.

A SMALL New Yorker had been having a day of unmitigated outrageousness, and when he was ready for bed his mother said to him: "When you say your prayers, Georgie, ask God to make you a better boy. You hav been very naughty today." The youngster accordingly put up his petitions in the usual form, and then before closing with "Amen," he added: "And please, God, make me a good boy." He paused a second, and then, to the utter consternation of his mother, concluded with unabated gravity: "Nevertheless, not my will, O Lord, but thine be done!"

"YOU had a most glaring typographical error in your paper this morning, Colonel Shedgore," remarked the school-teacher, as he dropped into the editorial sanctum and took a seat on a pile of exchanges. "Ha!" exclaimed the colonel, glaring at the cowering form of his proof-reader and assistant at the table in the corner, "where was it?" "About half-way down the 'Religious Miscellany' column——" "Shucks!" said the Texas editor, considerably relieved. "I'll bet $500 that I havn't a subscriber that'll ever see it."—Chicago Tribune.

"WHAT was cats made for, mother?" asked a Somerville little boy who had been scratched by a household tabby. "Cats made for? well, I suppose to kill mice." "Who made 'em?" "God made them." "What was mice made for?" "What were mice made for? For some purpose, I suppose. For cats to catch, perhaps." "Did God make the mice, too?" "He did. He made all things." "Well, if the cats is made for catchin' mice, God wouldn't needed to make cats if he hadn't made any mice, would he?" "No, I suppose not." "What did he make 'em for, then?" "Make what?" "The mice." "Child, it's time for you to go to school. Hurry, or you'll be late."

A LECTURER said: "I must beg you to giv me your undivided attention; indeed, it is absolutely impossible that you could form a true idea of the hideous animal of which we are about to speak, unless you keep your eyes fixed on me." A certain clergyman pleading earnestly with his parishioners for the construction of a cemetery for their parish, asked them to consider the "deplorable condition of thirty thousand Englishmen living without Christian burial." Still more curious was this clerical slip. A gentleman said to the minister: "When do you expect to see Deacon S. again?" "Never," said the reverend gentleman, solemnly; "the deacon is in heaven."—Chambers's Journal.

Gems of Thought.

ONE indispensable in Bible-writing is ambiguity; and, in the vague, equivocal, and obscure, Ezra was a perfect master. In writing a human book it is necessary to make it convey some specific meaning; but, in writing a divine book, care has to be taken to giv it no meaning in particular: make it mean anything or nothing, and always leave a loophole through which the apologist can slip out and explain away whatever may oppose the particular position for which he contends, If you are writing a Bible and find yourself degenerating into anything like explicable common sense, it is incumbent on you to mix your sentence up with candlesticks and wheat and beasts and chariots and horns and souls of men and trumpets and millstones and dragons and stars and phials and earthquakes, till no sane person would write such a passage and no sane person would read it; then it will hav all the better chance to pass unchallenged as "the word of God." A God or an oracle should never utter anything that has not at least two meanings.—Saladin's God and His Book.

CHANGE in scripture was possible only by giving new meanings to old words, a process rendered necessary by the continued acquisition of facts somewhat inconsistent with a literal interpretation of the "sacred records."—Ingersoll.

IN the nine heavens are eight paradises:
Where is the ninth one? In the human breast.

Rather, O man! want those eight paradises

THE vulgar look with high veneration upon whatever is extravagant and extraordinary, and conceive a more than common sanctity to be concealed under the veil of obscurity. The average man clings to the mysterious, the supernatural.—Popular Science Monthly.

THE consciousness of the divine presence in an unscientific age is identified with the idea of abnormal and capricious action; in a scientific age, with that of regular and unbroken law. The one conception predisposes most to prayer; the other, to reverence and admiration.—Lecky's History of Rationalism.

THE two principal sources of superstition are ignorance and danger; ignorance keeping men unacquainted with natural causes, and danger making them recur to supernatural ones. Or, to express the same proposition in other words, the feeling of veneration, which, under one of its aspects, takes the form of superstition, is a product of wonder and of fear; and it is obvious that wonder is connected with ignorance, and that fear is connected with danger. Hence it is, that whatever in any country increases the total amount of amazement, or whatever in any country increases the total amount of peril, has a direct tendency to increase the total amount of superstition, and therefore to strengthen the hands of the priesthood.—Buckle's History of Civilization.

MISSIONARY METHODS OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

The Church of England is no more nor less than an aristocratic, military, religious class organization, and has been for centuries. It is composed of an aristocracy of wealth, that has gone and goes out to-day all over the world with the Bible and prayer-book in one hand, and a sword in the other; with a baggage train of opium and whisky to rob, plunder, and debauch the people when it gains foothold.—O. D. Jones, in American Nonconformist.

Notes and Clippings.

AMERICA must become either Catholic or Infidel. There is no alternativ.—Catholic Standard.

SOME religious papers are noting it as a curious fact that the bigger a clergyman's salary is the longer is his vacation.

ROMAN Catholicism is not faring well in Italy. The procession of the blessed sacrament in Turin was jeered and once stoned, and for the first time the military did not present arms.—Sun.

THE Vienna correspondent of the London Times says: "Austria through Cardinal Galumberti, the papal nuncio at Vienna has prevailed upon the pope to remain at Rome, in order to avoid embarrassing the Italian government."

AN editorial in the Home Journal opens thus: "The text of the little sermon we intend preaching is taken from the news column of a metropolitan journal and reads as follows: 'It was an open secret that some members of the congregation were desirous of having the pastor removed on account of his democratic disposition and inclination to be friendly with all classes, which was considered undignified.'"

THE American Sabbath Union has issued a circular asking religious bodies to send to the next Congress the following petition: "Resolved, That we petition Congress to make the day of inauguration the first Wednesday of March or the last Wednesday of April, to avoid the serious occasion for Sabbath breaking and law breaking that arises from having inauguration occur near the beginning of the week."

POPE LEO XIII. has sent an autograph letter to the authorities of Laval University, Montreal, thanking them and the citizens of Quebec for the resolutions adopted by them at the demonstration on April 28th last in favor of the restoration of the temporal power of the pope. His holiness congratulates them not only upon their prudence, but upon the sagacity of their action, and says it is evident that they well understand how the impunity enjoyed by the enemies of the church is the source of improprieties in human society and of troubles to the state.

THE subject of the possible departure from Rome of the pope was freely discussed by the Italian cabinet a few days ago, with King Humbert himself presiding over its deliberations. It was generally agreed that no decision of any sort could be reached in advance of the actual announcement by the pope of his intentions, since the whole subject would hav to be regarded in one light if the pope left Rome in time of profound peace, and quite differently if war were threatened. A telegram from Madrid announces that a definit agreement had been reached between the Vatican and the Spanish government, that in the event of war the pope and the Sacred College shall be installed in the Escurial palace, near Madrid.

THE state of the English church is regarded to be such by a large body of influential members that they lately met and adopted the following resolution: "That while gratefully acknowledging the past efforts of existing Protestant organizations in vindicating the Reformation principles of the established church, and disclaiming all desire to interfere with their work, this conference is of opinion that the present critical state of the church of England demands that churchmen who desire to maintain the principles of the Reformation, the present prayer-book and articles, and the acts of uniformity as standards of ritual and doctrin in the national church should further unite and organize; and that for this purpose a union, under the name of the Protestant Churchmen's Alliance, be hereby formed, with branches in every diocese of England and Wales."

THE Nebraska State Journal says: The "Rev. Billy Sowders" is the name of a new evangelist who proposes to make the West his field, and it is said that he has thus far been marvelously successful in rescuing souls. The chances are that he is ignorant, horsey, and slangy. He doubtless assures his hearers that "der duffer what don't repent will be in der soup." The Journal is sick unto death of the reverend Billys and the reverend Sams and the reverend Bens and the reverend Johnnies. The business of snatching brands from the burning has been relegated to some very queer hands of late years. The country is swarming with reformed gamblers, reformed prize-fighters, reformed rakes of all kinds, Salvation Army cranks, and long-haired gospel experts who make a farce of religion, and who should be suppressed in the interest of public morality.

THE small boy of Stonington, Conn., attended the dedication of the cornerstone for the Baptist church there the other day, and he attended strictly to business. When no one was watching he smuggled a paper of his own among the public papers that were inurned in the archives under the cornerstone, and it was dedicated along with the stone and other affinitiv things appertaining to the occasion. The youth did not publish his feat until after the stone had been cemented in its place and the construction of the edifice was begun. Then the pious elders sternly demanded what writing he had committed in his paper to the archives. He could not tell a lie, and he said it was, "Do you wear pants?" The Stonington Baptist church wonders what posterity will think of its ancestry if, digging at some time among the ruins of the church, it disinters the mysterious interrogatory.

ACCORDING to a communication recently addressed by the eminent scientist, M. Brown-Séquard, to the French Academy of Medicin, it appears that he has prepared a concoction warranted to infuse fresh doses of vital energy into constitutions shattered by age or illness. As yet, for there is no public record of its trial as a recuperativ and revitalizing agent, all that can be said is that it is intrinsically compounded of revolting materials. The physiologist, it is stated, cuts out certain parts of living animals, such as guinea pigs, and the pieces of quivering flesh, pounded together by the pestle and mortar of pharmaceutical commerce, are made into a kind of paste with water. The essence of this compound is then injected under the skin of the patient with a syringe similar to that employed by the votaries of morphine. It is needless to say that the results of M. Brown-Séquard's experiments are awaited with eagerness by elderly Fausts.

Science and Its Accusers.

From the Popular Science Monthly.

Not many months ago we had in a single number of a leading English review—the Contemporary—no less than two articles by able writers lamenting the disintegrating action of science on morality and religion. The first of these was from the pen of the eminent Belgian publicist, M. Emile de Laveleye, and was entitled "The Future of Religion;" the second, contributed by Miss Frances Power Cobbe, dealt in a trenchant and aggressiv manner with "The Scientific Spirit of the Age." Both writers seem to be strong anti-Darwinians; but both attack the Darwinian doctrin, not on scientific grounds, but on account of its alleged incompatibility with views and sentiments which they regard as of preëminent importance. The only relevant criticism, however, that can be directed against a scientific doctrin is one intended to show that it is not what it claims to be—that it is not scientific—that it has no proper place in the scheme of our acquired and organized knowledge. If a scientific opinion is not established, if it is not demonstrated beyond all possibility of cavil, why concern one's self about it, except to invalidate the claims that may hav been wrongly put forward on its behalf? To discuss its bearing on religion is merely to suggest that it is true, but that "pity 'tis 'tis true," and to offer a premium to weak souls to try to persuade themselvs that it is not true. If a doctrin is true, and yet inconsistent with a certain theological scheme, what is going to be done about it? Will whole books of lamentations nullify it? Will it be disproved by the most diffuse argumentation designed to show that, if it holds its ground, something else will hav to giv way? Of course it will hold its ground if it is true; and of course whatever is inconsistent with it must giv way, and the world must adapt itself as best it can to the change.

But let us consider in detail some of the accusations brought against modern science and its professors by the critics whose names we hav mentioned. "Darwinism," says M. de Laveleye, "applied to social sciences, sets aside all notions of equality, and simply glorifies the triumph of the strongest and the cleverest." Darwinism is properly a form or phase of biological doctrin, and as such does not glorify anything particularly. Even in the realm to which it strictly applies there is no glorification of natural selection, merely a recognition of the fact that natural selection is an activ agency in the production of results that come under our observation. The only possible application of Darwinism to "social sciences" would lie in a close examination of social phenomena, in order to see whether there also a principle of natural selection might be found to be at work. In this sense Darwinism may be said to hav been applied to the social sciences, and with good results so far as our comprehension of social phenomena is concerned. But is it a sin to understand social phenomena? In all other departments of observation we esteem it a great advantage to get on the track of Nature's operations, to be able to follow her secret processes; and it is really difficult to see why we should debar ourselvs from understanding, as far as it may be given to us to do so, the course of things in the social order. The true Darwinian does not seek to impose a law on things—he leaves that to his theological censors; he is content to discover law in things. There is simply no sense, therefore, in talking of the Darwinian exulting in force, or glorifying "the triumph of the strongest and the cleverest." At the same time it may be remarked that it is hard to understand how, except by some very special and extraordinary interposition of providence, "the strongest and the cleverest" are to be prevented from triumphing; and upon the whole it seems a more natural, and indeed beneficial, arrangement that the "strong and clever" should dominate the weak and stupid, than that the weak and stupid should dominate the strong and clever. We doubt whether nature will wait for the approval of the Darwinian or of anyone else before giving, as a general thing, the race to the swift, the battle to the strong, and wages to the man who can earn them.

The Darwinian is accused by the Belgian philosopher of holding that "charity and pretended justice interfere very wrongly" when they seek to prevent stronger races and individuals from usurping the place of weaker ones. The Darwinian takes up no such absurd position. He is an observer of nature, we cannot too often repeat, and not a lawgiver. As an observer of nature he perceives that physical strength divorced from intellectual strength is ineffectual, and, in the struggle for life, hardly to be distinguished from weakness. He observes further that intellectual acuteness divorced from moral sentiment overreaches itself, and becomes a kind of stupidity. From multiplied observations of this nature he forms a truer idea, probably, than any mere a priori reasoner as to the forces which rule the world now, and as to those which will be chiefly dominant in the future. He is not opposed to any charity that, in his judgment, tends to make men better; but he could not be a man of any sense if he were not opposed to much that calls itself charity. As to justice, he sees in it the expression of a social force, which has its origin in the fact that society is an organism, the general life of which reacts upon any abnormal manifestations in special members or organs. Far from its being true that justice "stands in the way of the application of natural laws," justice may be said to be a striking illustration of the great natural law or axiom that the whole is greater than the part. To abandon justice would be to place all social order at the mercy of individual caprice; in other words, it would be the suicide of society.

We are next treated to an imaginativ sketch of what the world would be like in the absence of all religion: "There is no God and no immutable type of truth and justice." Just how the persuasion that there is no God is going to take possession of mankind is not explained, whether through the utter breaking down of the evidence upon which the doctrin of a divine being has heretofore been believed in, or through some further progress of philosophical speculation. One is tempted to ask, however, what the critic really wants. Are there certain doctrins which he wishes to shield from criticism? If so, why not say so distinctly? Why not say in plain terms that mankind has, in some way difficult to explain, got possession of certain opinions or convictions of inestimable value, but which can no more bear examination than a soap-bubble can bear handling, and that therefore these must, at all costs, be protected from every breath of criticism? If this is not what is meant, if, on the contrary, it is maintained that the being of God is a luminous truth, proclaiming itself in the very heart of man, why not challenge all the philosophies of the world to assail it at their peril? Why not say to Darwinians and all others: "Push your researches as far as you like; make your most comprehensiv inductions, your widest generalizations; construct your most daring theories: not only will nothing impair this great central truth of deity, but all the truths you gather will lack significance till illuminated by it?" But, strictly speaking, the Darwinian theory has nothing to do with the question as to the existence of God. It is no more Atheistic in its nature than the Newtonian theory of gravitation. The latter substituted for the angeli rectores of Kepler an all-pervading law of matter; and Darwinism substitutes for certain supposed acts of spasmodic creation an orderly sequence of development; but neither one nor the other professes to say how the origin of the universe should be conceived. If Darwinism has weakened the argument for Theism in certain minds, it has strengthened it in others—witness the recent address of Mr. Balfour on "Positivism," before the church congress at Manchester.

We are threatened with the destruction of an "immutable type of truth and justice;" but what is the exact meaning of these words? If truth is the conformity of statement to fact, how can the idea of truth ever vanish from the world? Certainly, if such a result should ever come about, it would not be due to the influence of any honest form of scientific thought. We do not think anyone will say that Mr. Darwin did anything in his long lifetime to weaken respect for truth, or to make truth less a reality in the world. We know some people whose efforts do tend strongly in that direction; but, for the most part, they are not Darwinians; they are people who cannot bring themselvs to define the terms they use, and who try to make authority do the work of demonstration. So successful, unfortunately, are teachers of this class, that throughout a large portion of society—the portion in which Darwinism is very generally flouted and scouted—a sense for truth in intellectual matters is most conspicuously lacking. As to an "immutable type of justice," does anyone know what that means? Can anyone conceive what an immutable type of justice would be like? How would it be expressed? In an act? We can either now conceive an act that would serve as an immutable type of justice, or we cannot: if we can, then the type is safe; if we cannot—which we imagin is the truth—then we must forego the hope of an immutable type, and content ourselvs with what perhaps is good enough for us—relativ justice—such justice as will serve our need from day to day.

Another threat held out is the miserable condition to which human life would be reduced if faith in a future life should disappear—a result that Darwinism is credited with hastening. Let us talk seriously on this subject. If there is evidence of a conscious life for human beings beyond the grave, Darwinism surely cannot overthrow it. It may possibly be that heretofore the doctrin of immortality has been taught on very insufficient grounds, and that Darwinism has so far awakened the popular intelligence that the insufficiency has become apparent; but, if so, Darwinism is not to blame. It is simply a question of repairing the breaches in a damaged argument. A true doctrin does not need false supports; on the contrary, no greater service can be rendered to a true doctrin than to throw it back on its legitimate proofs. So far, therefore, as this or any other doctrin is true, Darwinism can only establish it the more firmly by taking away the insecure foundations on which it may provisionally hav rested. The question is worth raising, however, whether the invalidation of this theory of a future life—not that we see how Darwinism as such is going to accomplish such a result—would hav so disastrous an effect as M. de Laveleye assumes upon human happiness. He imagins some one addressing the toilers of the world, and bidding them, as "there is no compensation elsewhere," to raise their heads, "too long bent to the dust beneath the yoke of tyrants and priests." Is it possible that so distinguished a Liberal as M. de Laveleye wants to join himself to tyrants and priests in their endeavors to hold down the working-classes by the promis or the lure of "compensation elsewhere?" Compensation for what? For injustice? But if the next world is to make amends for the injustices of this, then why lament over what the people might do if they rose against the holders of wealth? At the worst they could only work injustice, and the next world will make amends for all that. Why should not next-world sauce, that is found so admirably adapted for the laboring-man goose, be equally suitable for the capitalist gander? But if it is not injustice, but merely misery, for which a compensation is to be found in a future life, the lesson to be learned, we presume, is that the miseries of this life are to be endured in a patient spirit, and that no particular effort need be made to redress them here and now. But how all this talk about a future life tends to confuse our ideas and paralyze our activities in dealing with present interests! Instead of trying to administer an anodyne to those who suffer by holding out promises of future enjoyment, we should be far more disposed to tell them that their right and duty is to make the best of this world; and that the best will be made of it by studying and conforming to the conditions on which happiness depends—the conditions that make for the general improvement of life, physical and social. To speak plainly, it seems to us a very mean business for those who occupy positions of vantage in this world to preach compensation in another world to their less favorably situated brethren, in order to make them contented with their lot here. The sooner the calculations of all men are placed on a present-world basis, the better it will be for every important human interest.

But we are told that, not infrequently, "with religion morality also disappears;" inasmuch as "science, when reduced to material observation, can only know what is, not what ought to be." What is meant by reducing science to "material observation?" Science, we take it, observes all that can be observed; and we are not aware of any proposition to cut science off from any field in which observation is possible. If science—in the broadest sense—cannot teach us what ought to be, what can? The fact is, that "what ought to be" depends in the most intimate manner on what is; so that, the more perfectly one knows what is, the more clearly he discerns what ought to be. Let any intelligent man examin himself, and say whether any sense of obligation he has does not directly result from some knowledge he possesses of what is. "The denial of the spirituality of the soul," says our philosopher, "uproots all reasonable motivs for being just and honest." But supposing that one religiously refrains from either affirming or denying a proposition the terms of which he cannot understand, is there any obstacle to his being just and honest? We trow not; and this attitude of mind, we fancy, is that which characterizes most thinkers of the Darwinian or evolutionist school. But why any speculativ opinion on the nature of "the soul" should stand in the way of anybody's honesty, it is hard to understand. If the opinion, whatever it may be, has been honestly arrived at, and is honestly held, that simple fact will be a guarantee to some extent for honesty in other matters. It is not difficult to find people whose views about "the soul" are quite unexceptionable from the orthodox point of view, but whose daily practice is far from exemplifying a high type of honesty and justice. "Duty without God or a future life," we are sententiously informed, "is a very fine word, but it has no meaning whatever." Alas! what meaning has it with many of those who profess the strongest belief in these doctrins! We should like to ask M. de Laveleye and others who talk in this fashion whether, on the strength of their own experience, they can affirm that theological unbelievers as a class are morally inferior to believers. The fact is, as we believe, that the average of morality in the so-called orthodox world is very poor, and that it will continue to be so until a new element is introduced into it from the scientific study of nature, the element of intellectual honesty. It is easy to make such statements as that, "if all religious feeling were to melt away, a return to primitiv barbarism would be inevitable," but to prove them might not be so easy. It may be remarked that primitiv barbarism has always been marked by strong religious feeling as well as by comprehensiv ignorance; and, therefore, if we succeeded in getting back to primitiv barbarism, we should hav reached a fine starting-point for another religious evolution. M. de Laveleye, however, does not expect that things will get to this pass; his idea is that our future civilization will be presided over by a purified form of Christianity based upon the most elevated teachings of its founder. What the future of Darwinism will be he does not tell us—whether it will vanish from the earth like an exhalation, or mingle with and perchance support the new creed. If the former is to be its destiny, we should hav some hint as to the probable manner of its going; if the latter, it is hard to see why it should hav been made an object of attack.

Miss Cobbe, who discusses "The Scientific Spirit of the Age," admits that she does it "from an adverse point of view." The "epoch-making biography of Mr. Darwin," containing his "admirably candid avowal of the gradual extinction in his mind of the esthetic and religious elements," has, she thinks, "arrested not a few science-worshipers with the query, What shall it profit a man if he find the origin of species and know exactly how earth-worms and sun-dews conduct themselvs, if all the while he grow blind to the loveliness of nature, deaf to music, insensible to poetry, and as unable to lift his soul to the divine and eternal as were the primeval apes from whom he has descended?" Miss Cobbe hastens to show that, for her own sake, she has not sacrificed everything to science, by making a few remarks in a very unscientific spirit on the effects of scientific study. It promotes, she tells us, practical Materialism. The student of science will—we quote the actual words of this once highly rational and thoroughly Liberal-minded writer—"view his mother's tears not as expressions of her sorrow, but as solutions of muriates and carbonates of soda and of phosphates of lime; and he will reflect that they were caused, not by his heartlessness, but by cerebral pressure on her lachrymal glands. When she dies, she will 'peep and botanize' on her grave, not with the poet's sense of the sacrilegiousness of such ill-placed curiosity, but with the serene conviction of the meritoriousness of accurate observation of the flora of a cemetery." What are we to say of this if not that it is unmitigated trash? Is it known that home affections are less powerful or less sacred in scientific than in unscientific households? Is there even ground to conjecture that such is the case? If not, such language as the above simply shows that Miss Cobbe, who has written so much and so well in times past, is growing hysterical at the very period of life when we might hav expected to see her manifesting in a special degree the qualities of moderation and self-control, of calm insight and wide sympathy.

Miss Cobbe objects to the scientific spirit that it makes much of disease and little of sin. If so, it is simply inverting the habit of past times, which was to make much of sin and little of disease. And what was "sin" in the apprehension of our ecclesiastically-directed forefathers? To a large extent it consisted in what the clergy of a certain church would call "irregularity"— some want of conformity with ecclesiastical rules and requirements. It was by no means always coincident with immorality. A man might hav a lively sense of "sin" in connection with some purely ceremonial matter, and very little sense of wrong-doing in connection with the most grievous offenses against his fellow-man. In obedience to the "code of honor," men who regarded themselvs as pillars of church and state would prepare to commit deliberate murder; while they would always consider a gambling debt as vastly more sacred than one incurred for food or clothing. The "Christian" nations hav found enormous quantities of "sin" in heresy, and very little indeed in mutual bloodshed on the most appalling scale. Pious monarchs hav appeased their consciences by persecuting the Jews, and pious folk generally by hunting witches. According to popular opinion in our own day, the divine anger is much more quickly kindled by the parody of a religious rite than by the most hideous villainy perpetrated by a man upon his neighbor. Every now and again there is a story in the papers about some boy or man struck blind or dumb for blasphemy, or of the personal appearance of the devil among some group of revelers engaged in profanely mocking a religious ceremony! So various hav been the aspects in which "sin" has presented itself, and so little relation has it seemed to bear in any of its best recognized forms with practical morality, that it is not to be wondered at if scientific men show some impatience with so vague and unsatisfactory a conception, and prefer to consider all conduct simply in its bearing on intelligible human interests. As to disease, they necessarily regard it as the great enemy, primarily, of man's physical estate, and secondarily of his intellectual and moral constitution; and if their chief efforts are bent on its extermination, it would be hard to say in what more useful work they could be engaged.

The next fault that Miss Cobbe finds with the scientific spirit, which she characterizes as "analytic, self-asserting, critical," is that it is directly opposed to the "synthetic, reverential, sympathizing spirit of art;" and she holds up to scorn the physicist who cannot enjoy the representation of figures suspended in the air in defiance of the law of gravity, and the zoologist who fails to admire cherubs without stomachs, and centaurs with a stomach to spare. Well, if we must confess it, our sympathy in each case is with the man of science; and we refuse to believe, on any evidence as yet tendered, that art would be less art if it condescended to recognize the laws of the physical universe. The poet Horace was no mean artist in his day, nor is there any reason to suppose that he was a victim to the scientific spirit; yet he has left on record his distaste for all such composit and unnatural creations as Miss Cobbe takes under her protection. He thought the centaur and the mermaid both very ridiculous figures. "Let a thing be what it may," he said, "but let it be simple, let it preserve its unity."* The greatest sculptors the world ever saw, those of ancient Greece, devoted themselvs almost wholly to the delineation of the human form in its ideal perfection; their art may hav sought to transcend the actual, but not the possible. If they strove to better nature, it was not by flying in the face of natural laws, but by a happier blending of natural elements; just as the gardener of to-day shows us what may be realized by giving to various plants better conditions than can be commanded in the rude competition for existence. Miss Cobbe will hav it that the scientific spirit would kill poetry. We do not believe a word of it; but we do believe that the scientific spirit applied to poetry would purge it of many morbid growths and ridiculous conceits. Some not incompetent judges are of the opinion that the very poem cited by Miss Cobbe in illustration, Shelley's "Sensitiv Plant," is overladen with imagery. The late Mr. Arnold did not find Shelley quite "sane" enough to be a poet of the first order; and if representativs of the scientific spirit occasionally find something in his verse that they cannot quite reconcile with common sense, they may plead that they are only finding what a great literary critic had already found. In lieu of such delicate fancies as Shelley has woven into his "Sensitiv Plant," the scientific spirit, we are told, would "describe how the garden had been thoroughly drained and scientifically manured with guano and sewage." This is not argument; it is hysteria running a little toward coarseness.

But may it be claimed that science is advancing the interests of truth? No; not the science of our time. We are simply gathering facts and deducing laws, subject to rectification when further facts shall hav been gathered. But "in other days truth was deemed something nobler than this. It was the interests that lay behind and beyond the facts, their possible bearings on man's deepest yearnings and sublimest hopes, which gave dignity and meaning to the humblest researches into rocks and plants." A little definition would come in well here. What are the interests that lie beyond the facts? What are man's deepest yearnings? What are his sublimest hopes? Are his sublimest hopes also his best-founded and most rational hopes? Are his deepest yearnings at all of a practical character? If these yearnings can be appeased at all by scientific conclusions, why not by those arrived at in our day as well as by the less correct ones arrived at in former days? Finally, what can science do more than put the most rational construction on facts? If more than this is wanted—some surplusage of belief—it can be got from other quarters; science should not be held responsible for furnishing it, or blamable for not furnishing it. Miss Cobbe does not seem to be of this opinion, however. She says that, as "science has repeatedly renounced all pretension to throw light in any direction beyond the sequence of physical causes and effects, she has . . . abandoned her claim to be man's guide to truth." But surely, if at any time in the past science made good her claim to transcend the sequence of physical causes and effects, we need not concern ourselvs with her present denegation of authority in the higher region. If a teacher has really succeeded in teaching us the calculus, we need not trouble ourselvs much if he should at some future time take it into his head that he never knew it himself. Supposing even that he never did know it, and that we only worked into it by the aid of his blunders, does not our knowledge remain? And what, in that case, can we do better than turn round and teach our teacher? On the other hand, if our teacher never knew what he thought he knew, and if we never learned what we thought we had learned, what can we both do better than acknowledge the true state of the case, and begin over again, should it seem desirable?

We are told that Darwin "has destroyed, for those who accept his views, the possibility for a rational reverence for the dictates of conscience." How? By raising a doubt as to "whether the convictions of man's mind, which has been developed from the mind of the lower animals, are of any value." We should suppose that, the further back an organism could be traced, the more authority might be attached to what seem to be its laws. Who would not much rather trust a conscience that had a long history behind it, one stretching back even into the brute creation, than a brand-new article of whose genesis no satisfactory account could be given? Moreover, how is it that we think so little of another man's conscience, when it enjoins acts of which we disapprove; and that he thinks so little of ours when it enjoins acts of which he disapproves? It no more occurs to us to think that the deity has specially enlightened him on the point in question, than it occurs to him to pay our conscientious conviction a similar compliment. We get over the difficulty, not improbably, by hinting that he is a "crank," and the same mode of escape is open to him in relation to us. The criticism of conscience, as Miss Cobbe must well know, antedates Darwin by at least three centuries. The philosopher, whose motto was "Que sais-je?" expounded its weaknesses more fully than Darwin ever did; and Locke defines it very briefly as "our own opinion of the moral rectitude or pravity of our own actions." Dugald Stewart shows that the sentiment of the sacredness of property varies from country to country, according to the amount of labor requisit to produce articles of value; and that in other respects local accidents decide to a great extent the form that moral opinion takes. Hartley explained the phenomena of conscience by association; and, since his day, to go no further back, the idea of conscience as a special organ uttering the voice of the deity has been weakening among thinking men. The evolutionists of to-day hav simply succeeded in giving a wider basis to views that were in the world long before their time; but to say that they hav in any way lowered the dignity of man's moral nature is to state what is not the case. Miss Cobbe is pleased to suggest that the old ideas gave a basis for moral effort "as firm as the law of the universe itself;" but that henceforth our only fulcrum will be "the sand-heap of hereditary experiences." If anything could less deserve the designation of "sand-heap" than our accumulated hereditary experiences, we should like to know what it is. In the case of the sand-heap there is an utter lack of cohesion; in the case of hereditary experiences cohesion is of their very nature. Miss Cobbe understands this perfectly; it is a pity she should hav written as though she did not.

We are very far, therefore, from admitting that "the scientific spirit" has "sprung a mine under the deepest foundations of morality;" or that it is as impossible for a man who holds the evolutionary idea of the origin of conscience "to cherish a great moral ambition as it is for a stream to rise above its source." If, on the one hand, science moderates ambition by keeping before the mind the limits of the possible, on the other it stimulates ambition by producing the conviction that certain things are not only possible, but certain of attainment if the right means are used. There was a time in the history of science when men were laboring to transmute the baser metals into gold; that particular ambition has been abandoned with others equally chimerical; but it surely cannot be said that science to-day discourages effort in the field of chemistry. Precisely so in the moral region: we no longer expect to work miracles, but we do expect and hope by wisely concerted measures to accomplish better and greater results than were ever accomplished by the enthusiasms and fanaticisms of the past. Miss Cobbe says that "the man of science may be anxious to abolish vice and crime, . . . but he has no longing to enthrone in their place a lofty virtue demanding his heart and life's devotion. He is almost as much disturbed by extreme goodness as by wickedness." Is not this weak and almost meaningless language? What is meant by "enthroning a lofty virtue" in the place of vice and crime? The phrase has a fine sound, but it seems to be a case of præteria nihil. What a man of science would like to see would be a society organized and governed according to the best knowledge of the time. He would like to see the laws of life and health respected, justice maintained among men, and free scope given to individual development. As to the lofty virtue which Miss Cobbe so strongly desiderates, the scientific man would like to do away with the necessity for it by a general leveling up of human life. He believes, with Jean Jacques Rousseau, that prudence is a virtue which enables us to dispense with many others; and that, if the human race could be taught prudence, great reformers and missionaries might hav an easy time of it, and perhaps be enabled to practice a little of their charity at home—an excellent starting-point, according to the proverb. The scientific man's ideal is necessarily a prosperous community of fairly self-sufficing individuals, not a world of misery lightened by the angel visitations and exertions of a few heroic souls. Some may think his ambition a low one, but he does not feel it to be so himself; he does not really see how anyone who wishes well to the mass of his fellow-men can hav any different ambition.

"Another threatening evil from the side of science is the growth of a hard and pitiless temper." So Miss Cobbe; and this in face of the fact that never in the history of the world was there so much sympathy with suffering, or so ready a recognition of the rights of humanity, as there is to-day. Reference is made to certain vague charges brought in an anonymous book against hospital physicians and students; but, even admitting these charges as true in some substantial measure—and we should be sorry to do so without further proof—no good reason can be assigned for charging on the scientific world at large a morbid temper displayed by a few representativs of one single profession. Compare the average practicing physician of to-day with the Slops and Sangrados of former times, and we fancy there is no visible falling off in humanity or any other respectable quality. What cannot be denied is that science has done a great work in mitigating suffering and lengthening human life; and it would be strange indeed if the ministers of these benefits were themselvs indifferent to the very objects of their labors.

* Denique sit quidvis, simplex duntaxat et unum.
—Ars Poetica, 23.

Finally, joining hands with M. de Laveleye, Miss Cobbe declares that science destroys religion. The only reply to giv on this point is just this: that, if science and religion are natural enemies, one must destroy the other; that if they are not, if each has its basis in nature, then neither will destroy the other; but, after a mutual adjustment of their claims, each will confirm and strengthen the other. Science is nothing else than knowledge of the facts and laws of the universe. If religion cannot survive the acquisition of such knowledge by mankind, then it must perish; but we should be sorry to affirm that its position is so precarious. One thing is certain, Science cannot go back. She has begun a series of interpretations of the great book of Nature that prove to be of ever-increasing interest from year to year. She cannot stop in this career. The book has only been fairly opened; the true key to its hieroglyphics has just been found; the practical results already achieved by means of the knowledge acquired are full of advantage in the present and of promis for the future; what is there to do, therefore, but to go forward? Men of science may, as individuals, fall into many errors. They may fail to realize the true dignity of their calling; they may be unduly swayed by party spirit or by personal aims; they may be unworthy ministers of the truths which they deliver. But science, what is it but truth? And what is the scientific spirit but the spirit that bows to truth? To all who are dissatisfied with the present currents of thought we would, therefore, say: "Criticise men as much as you please. Po nt out their errors, their failings, intellectual and moral, with all needful severity. Hold up the standard by which you think their lives and thoughts ought to be governed. Criticise theories, too. Let nothing pass unchallenged or unscrutinized that you are not satisfied is true. Let no glamour of great names, no popularity of certain modes of thought, deter you from expressing your dissent from what you do not believe. But do not put yourself hopelessly in the wrong by attacking science, or by abusing the scientific spirit. You will gain nothing by it, but will merely darken your understandings, and shut yourselvs out from the light that is ready to lighten every man that comes into the world. Science will abide. It has its roots in the everlasting rocks and draws its aliment from universal nature. The scientific spirit will abide, admonishing men of their errors and leading them into all truth. It is wise to be reconciled to such powers as these; even now, while you are in the way with them, make terms of peace, and find rest to your souls."—W. De Le Sueur.

A Few Questions.

We would like to know why, if a book publisher can make more money by selling one million books at one cent profit on each book, than he can by selling one thousand for one dollar profit on each, a railway company cannot make more money by carrying sixty million people several times a year at a very small charge than it makes by carrying about ten million people at charges that are absolutely restrictiv?

Man is a traveling animal. He goes and comes again and again, and his example is followed by others, if they can afford it. The hog goes once and goes no more. Yet he is assisted on board the car; is carried slowly; is fed and watered, and his hogship is charged about ten cents per head per hundred mile trip. And the carriers make money by thus carrying him. Man goes on fast and cheaper trains, waits on himself, and is charged three hundred cents per hundred miles. Consequently five-sixths of the people who liv along the lines of railways never travel unless compelled to do so. The theory of charging people on the railroads for distance is all wrong. The charge should be for time. In countries where a merely nominal sum is charged for fourth-class travel the trains are crowded by the people, and the roads make more money on fourth-class trains than on first-class. One dollar for each one of a thousand is but one thousand dollars; one cent for each one of a million is ten thousand dollars. Do you see it? HOLT.

INSTEAD then of studying theology, as is now done, out of the Bible and Testament, the meaning of which books are always controverted, and the authenticity of which is disproved, it is necessary that we refer to the bible of the creation. The principles we discover there are eternal, and of divine origin. They are the foundation of all the science that exists in the world, and must be the foundation of theology.—Thomas Paine.

Liberals, This is Your Last Opportunity.

Those of you who hav read Mrs. Woodman's profound article, in my department two weeks ago, must hav felt deeply interested in the prize-manual project of President Westbrook, for the instruction of youth in natural morality.

Now is the time to act. The article was written under the impression that all the money was subscribed—though sufficient is at hand to insure that the rest will be forthcoming.

But you who read this will hav an opportunity to associate your name with one of the most important movements ever contemplated for the success of the Secular cause. It has a double significance.

Before we shall be sure of ultimate triumph in the contemplated effort to wrest Girard College from the theological pettifoggers who like bees are swarming about it, we must be ready to meet, in the most practicable way possible, this question, or obstacle:

Where is your system for the instruction of youth in the principles of pure morality, disassociated from the Bible and New Testament?

Once let us hav such a practical work on ethics written by recognized merit, indorsed by eminent and philosophical authority, and we then hav found the king-pin of our case against the untrustworthy trustees of Girard College.

Neither belief nor disbelief in theological dogmas indicate any moral quality. A person may be the most thorough skeptic and be perfectly conscientious and honest, while the most credulous Christian often lacks all the essentials of moral strength. This might also be reversed, and individuals intellectually freed from superstition are often found persons largely void of honor, integrity, or moral perception. The individual is not so much to blame as society, for we are only creatures of environment. That person's moral perceptions may hav been blunted and impaired by surrounding conditions, for which he was no more responsible than for the color of his hair or eyes.

What we, as Secularists, should do is to teach society to prepare or create such environments as will fully round out in future the moral and social qualities of the race.

There are innumerable volumes on moral philosophy, but they are entirely inadequate for the young, receptiv minds who are needing moral nurture and practical ideas in the cultivation of ethics.

The question also involved, and, I think, largely unsolved, is, what moral acts are, and after that is decided, how to teach them to the young. To my mind, morals are the combined sentiment of all the best of the ages, and belong neither to Bibles nor to religions, but to that great inspirer—experience. They are humanity's crystallizations in the school of utility.

Who will cover themselvs with lasting honor? Who will "build a mausoleum representing heart as well as brain?" Who will make a monetary sacrifice for the advancement of Secularism, the well-being of society, and the perpetuation of truth? Now let your noblest impulses soar, and down your sordid aspirations, remembering that this is as much for the glory of the American Secular Union as it will be a benison of joy to yourselvs!

About $200 more is needed by August 1st to complete the $1 000 necessary for this fund. We want it in sums either of $100, of $50, or of $25. I think the names of such donors to this fund should appear on every book issued under that copyright. Do not wait for some one else to act, but sit down now and send your check either to myself or to R. B. Westbrook, 1707 Oxford street, Philadelphia, Pa.

I hope that this appeal will not be in vain. Who will respond?

OUR WORK IN THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS

The able editorial warnings in recent issues of THE TRUTH SEEKER fully foreshadowed the efforts now being put forth by the National Reform Association to slaughter mental liberty and establish theological dominion, by engrafting the God-in-the-Constitution idea in the four newly-admitted states—North and South Dakota, Montana, and Washington.

At the constitutional conventions, now in session, the delegates are tossing between throes of progress and prejudice—of political advancement and party retreat, of radical courage and conservativ cowardice.

Many progressiv measures on land taxation hav been proposed, which, if faithfully adhered to, would include church sites, but which we fear, on their passage, will be so amended as to exempt that class of privileged property.

In the South Dakota constitutional convention, a proposition, we are informed, is likely to be adopted taxing all realty, also mortgages and other securities for debt. We sincerely hope such may pass.

We can only partially enumerate the progressiv constitutional limitations proposed by the delegates in their several conventions, and can only briefly summarize the most important measures, including as they do:

The abolition of a state senate, the adoption of the Australian system of voting, the adoption of universal or woman suffrage, compulsory education, appointment of labor bureaus, the forbidding of armed bodies (Pinkerton's detectivs) being brought into the state, and the adoption of a new judiciary system.

A Mr. Stevens is leading the fight in the constitutional convention at Bismarck for one legislativ body, which, it seems to us, is an excellent idea, and more democratic than the present absurd state senate. Such a legislativ body as proposed in the following resolution would be less expensiv, closer to the people, and more directly under their influence. Let us get down to democracy or republicanism in fact, and prove whether the people are safe guardians of their own liberty or not. The resolution reads:

Resolved, That the constitution provide that the legislativ authority of this state shall rest in a single body, to be called legislativ assembly, which shall consist of not less than one hundred members, to be elected by the people; provided the legislativ assembly may, from time to time, increase the number of members as necessity may require.

The conservativs are conniving at Prohibition, Sunday legislation, and all the train of priestly projects. The crafty district secretary of the National Reform Association—whose name is indicativ of intrigue—is busy with his Machiavellian scheming. Our Secular friends had, through the Freethought press, ample warning of their contemplated machinations, and ought to hav put forth their most strenuous efforts. If they hav proved ineffectual, it is because they were not organized—a condition readily remedied. We cannot hope to win without organization. The battle of progress is a continuous struggle. It has no lasting victory, and the American Secular Union is the only organization affording a nucleus whereby the phalanxes of mental freedom may maneuver more effectually. There must be a touching of elbows all along the line—a concentration and fulfilment of "In union there is strength." Our Secular friends should hav made strong memorials and presented them by personal appeals to those constitutional conventions.

District Secretary R. C. Wylie, of the National Reform Association, appeared before the constitutional convention at Helena, Mont., and submitted a memorial or proposition touching the moral principle of civil government. In it the statements are made that nearly all the state constitutions contain acknowledgments of almighty God more or less clearly expressed, but the National Reform Association desire something more definit. God should be acknowledged as the source of that authority which is vested in the majority. His will should be taken for a supreme law on all moral issues in the sphere of political life. The Lord should be recognized as the king of nations. Besides this a foundation should be laid for necessary legislation on the question of marriage and divorce, the Sabbath question, and moral instruction in our public schools.

The above slight summary of Brother Wylie's adroit work but feebly represents what is being done by outside pressure in those states. Several of our prominent Secularists, notable among whom is our Oregonian vice-president Mrs. M. J. Olds, hav been scattering our literature thickly in Montana and Washington, which it is hoped may hav found willing lodgment in the minds of the people and hav its desired effect on future legislation.

I notice with pleasure that Mr. Warren, of Silver Bow, Mont., introduced a memorial relativ to a Sunday law, asking that no legislation be enacted enforcing the observance of the Sabbath day. It admits the right of religious people to choose their own day of worship, but protests against their dictating to other creeds what day they shall observe. This memorial was referred to the committee on bill of rights.

The committee on bill of rights at Olympia, Wash., reported their preamble, which has the merit of being the briefest on record, and in the bill of rights the name of God is conspicuous by its absence. Absolute freedom of conscience in all religious matters is guaranteed, with the exception of polygamy.

If adopted, the provisions regarding religious liberty will do away with sectarian exercises in the public schools, and no public money is to be used for any religious training whatever therein. This is a Secular triumph indeed.

While frequently noticing partial extracts from the preamble and constitution of the National Reform Association, and as that document has from time to time undergone some amendments, I wish to present to your readers the latest revised edition, for which we are indebted to the courtesy of the Christian Statesman. I believe that the most effectual way to defeat this conspiracy is to understand it, and as they print our Nine Demands in their columns continuously, the widest possible publicity should be given by us to their efforts. We must keep it before our people, so that they may realize more than ever the forces, power, and influence of the enemy we must grapple with sooner or later. The Lord should be a perpetual alien to our laws. Look at the condition of the people in all nations where he is recognized as king. Read the following. Cut it out. Show it to your neighbors and ask their opinion on this insidious attempt to overthrow American institutions. God and liberty cannot exist in the same political document.

CONSTITUTION OF THE NATIONAL REFORM ASSOCIATION.

Believing that almighty God is the source of all power and authority in civil government, that the Lord Jesus Christ is the Ruler of nations, and that the revealed will of God is of supreme authority in civil affairs;

Remembering that this country was settled by Christian men, with Christian ends in view, and that they gave a distinctly Christian character to the institution which they established;

Perceiving the subtle and persevering attempts which are made to prohibit the reading of the Bible in our public schools, to overthrow our Sabbath laws, to corrupt the family, to abolish the oath, prayer in our national and state legislatures, days of fasting and thanksgiving, and other Christian features of our institutions, and so to divorce the American government from all connection with the Christian religion;

Viewing with grave apprehension the corruption of our politics, the legal sanction of the liquor traffic, and the disregard of moral and religious character in those who are exalted to high places in the nation;

Believing that a written constitution ought to contain explicit evidence of the Christian character and purpose of the nation which frames it, and perceiving that the silence of the Constitution of the United States in this respect is used as an argument against all that is Christian in the usage and administration of our government;

We, citizens of the United States, do associate ourselvs under the following articles, and pledge ourselvs to God, and to one another, to labor, through wise and lawful means, for the ends herein set forth:

Article I.—This society shall be called the "National Reform Association."

Article II.—The object of this society shall be to maintain existing Christian features in the American government; to promote needed reforms in the action of the government touching the Sabbath, the constitution of the family, the religious element in education, the oath, and public morality as affected by the liquor traffic and other kindred evils; and to secure such an amendment to the Constitution of the United States as will declare the nation's allegiance to Jesus Christ and its acceptance of the moral laws of the Christian religion, and so indicate that this is a Christian nation, and place all the Christian laws, institutions, and usages of our government on an undeniable legal basis in the fundamental law of the land.

Article III.—All persons approving these objects and contributing annually to its treasury shall be members of this society.

Article IV.—The officers of this association shall be the president, vice-presidents, general secretary, corresponding secretary, recording secretary, and treasurer, and such district, financial, and other secretaries as may be appointed by the executiv committee. The secretaries and treasurer, with twenty-one other members, shall be the executiv committee of the association.

Article V.—Any society adopting a constitution in harmony with the aims of the National Reform Association, and contributing annually to its treasury, shall be recognized as an auxiliary, and all members thereof shall be members of the National Reform Association.

Our London Letter.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: From the report of the National Secular Society's conference held on Whitsunday, I gather that this society is making very good headway. An addition of five new branches and close on to five hundred new members is encouraging from one point of view, though possibly these additions will not add much to the financial strength. Considering the very small income of the National Secular Society a vast amount of work is done, and if its income was equal to that of the Christian societies, Christianity would soon be a thing of the past. The president does not seem so hopeful as he was in former years, and it is certainly a very hard fight being carried on against creed. The enemy is numerically overpowering, and it will be a long time yet before he is put to flight. But even if Freethought as now understood were to become the belief of the majority, there would still be a small band still further advanced to carry on the same uphill work. The opposition to aggressiv Freethought is not so violent just now as it was a few years ago, and this seems somewhat to discourage certain members of the National Secular Society, as there is now so little scope for their combativ faculties, which are likely under such circumstances to fall into disuse. I am told that the London Secular Federation is doing activ work, and the results are a cause of congratulation.

Now that Mrs. Besant has joined the Theosophists, I am a little curious to know how she can consistently call herself an Atheist of the Materialistic school. I hav met with American Atheists who believe in Spiritualistic manifestations, but the terms appear to me totally opposed. It may be that there is a something in mankind above and beyond what there is in the lower orders of life, something that livs after what we understand as death, but this has never, so far as I know, been proved, nor hav I met with any argument that can warrant any such belief—nothing beyond a mere supposition. Louis Figuier's theory is to my mind the most plausible, but it possesses no scientific basis.

What will be the upshot of the excitement over the Bruno statue at Rome? The pope is not able to get over it, and it would be interesting to know what took place at the secret consistory just called. Are the cardinals to cast lots to decide who shall try and knock down the statue on the next dark night? If this single statue is such a severe blow to the papacy, perhaps the erection of a few more of other victims might finish it off entirely. I cannot understand why the pope should make so much fuss about it. As the Roman Catholic church is equally ready to prove that Bruno was not burnt at all, and that he well deserved his fate, why should it upset the poor old man?

But for a more important engagement I should hav attended a prophetic debate held last evening at the Cannon street Hotel on some disputed passage in Daniel's drivelings, in which the irrepressible Baxter largely figures. I don't ever remember having seen a real, genuin prophet, and as this is the only one on show I am rather anxious to inspect the "critter." There is to be another debate as to whether Christ and his glorified saints will liv during the millennium above the earth in a heavenly city fifteen hundred miles square and fifteen hundred miles high. It would be worth hearing, if only to hear where "above the earth" it happens to be situated.

Mr. Bradlaugh has, in the New Review, given his reasons for opposing legislativ action with regard to the eight-hours movement. He thinks that it is a tendency of most dangerous character "to look to the legislature or government to supply immediate remedies for all evils, however arising, in the struggle for existence," but if the legislature does not exist for the purpose of making laws for the benefit of the majority, of what use is it, and how is it possible to draw a hard and fast line as to legislativ interference? Was it wrong to abolish slavery by act of Parliament? It is urged that artisans on the continent work longer hours for less wages than in England, but do they turn out an equal amount for a day's work? Skilled labor can generally dictate its own terms, but it is the large army of workers who are unable to do this that require assistance from Parliament. The question is undoubtedly a very difficult one, and will bear looking at from many points of view, but when employers are making large fortunes out of the blood and bones of the employed, political economy must stand aside in the interests of humanity.

A Roman Catholic Elsmere.

From the London Telegraph.

The Rev. A. Jerome P. Matthews, for the past two years Roman Catholic priest at St. Mary's, Bath, has addressed the following letter to the members of his congregation:

MY VERY DEAR FRIENDS: I hav to make an announcement which will be painful alike to yourselvs and to me. It shall be very brief, for it is sad to me to part from you; it will be sadder for you to learn the cause. After long and anxious thought and study, I hav arrived at the conviction that the Jewish and Christian scriptures, though possessing many excellences, are full of legendary and mythological statements, and that they possess no claim to and manifest no evidence of divine inspiration; that the Roman Catholic church has no claim to be regarded as a divinely constituted authority; that the papacy is a human institution, gravely compromised to error and superstition, and, therefore, injurious to the spiritual and temporal welfare of mankind; that Jesus Christ, though a holy man and ardent reformer, was not the great God of the universe, but the son of Joseph and Mary; that neither demoniacal spirits, nor a place or state of everlasting torment hav any existence in fact, but originate in ancient mythologies. With these convictions, which I hav striven against for a long time without success, it would be dishonest for me to continue as a priest, teaching only the pure theism of natural spiritual religion, which I profoundly believe and desire to promote. I therefore this day return to our excellent and kind bishop the sacerdotal faculties intrusted to me by his lordship. I retire from the midst of you with a heart full of kindness and gratitude to you all. All the confidences, spiritual and temporal, of my ministry will be faithfully observed. As soon as I can get my house off my hands I shall leave it, as my continued presence close to the church would be a painful reminder to us both of a past full of happiness until doubt agitated my mind. These doubts I hav been careful not to unfold to any of you, and I hav provided for you the ministry of worthy priests ignorant of my mental conflict. With a sad and loving heart, then, I commend you, my dear and valued friends, to the eternal father of spirits, and let us ever remember one another in the presence of the all-holy one. Bidding you all a sorrowful farewell, I remain, Always affectionately yours,

ARNOLD JEROME P. MATTHEWS.

Sonnet to Shamgar.

Ho! Shamgar, mighty one of long ago,
Puissant wielder of the ox-goad deadly,
You died and left your patronymic redly
Linked to one slaughter anything but slow!
Six hundred Philistines, at one fell swoop,
You slew, 'tis said—the number nothing swollen,
Though name of battle's lost, mislaid or stolen—
Ox-goad in hand! Odds blood! O Red Shirt, whoop,
Before Red Shamgar's pales thy ruddy hand!
O mighty chieftain of the Hebrew nation,
O Shamgar of the ox-goad allegation,
Ah, how those fated Philistines you tanned!
On war's red field thou wert a stalwart stalker,
With ox-goad armed a veritable corker! SI SLOKUM.

The Struggle With Obscurantism.

Karl Blind in the Nineteenth Century.

What were Bruno's sufferings in the darkness of the dungeon in which the Inquisition kept him! What ferocious attempts were made to bend and break the energy of the highly cultured, unfrocked friar whose mind was nourished with the love of antiquity! If, as a prisoner, he had a moment of faltering, the answer has been given in the words, "How can you expect that torture, even though applied for hours, should prevail against a whole life of study and inquiry?" Campanella, who, after Bruno, was kept in prison for twenty-seven years, said of his own sufferings: "The last time I was tortured it was for forty hours. I was fettered with cords which cut to the very bones; I was hung up with hands tied back, a most sharp piece of wood being used, which cut out large parts of my flesh and produced a vast loss of blood." Perhaps some day, when the archives of the Vatican become fully accessible, we shall learn a little more of Bruno's last years of torment. On being informed of his doom, he, in the face of a horrible death, heroically said to his inhuman judges: "Perhaps you pronounce your sentence with greater fear than that with which I receive it!" Among those who formed the tribunal was Cardinal Bellarmin, the same who, later on, forced Galileo to an apparent recantation, and Cardinal Sanseverina, who had called the massacre of the night of St. Bartholomew "a splendid day most pleasant to Catholics." The sentence against Bruno was, as usual, to be carried out "without the spilling of blood." In the bandit language of the Inquisition, as Hermann Brunnhofer expresses it, this signified burning at the stake. Before the victim of priestcraft was sacrificed his tongue was torn with pincers. But it still speaks to posterity in powerful accents. More and more it is seen that a great deal of that which, in this country, Darwin, Huxley, Tyndall, Lyell, Lubbock, and others hav by their masterly and successful researches made the common intellectual property of all educated people had been divined, in some measure, by the prescient genius of Bruno. Unaided by exact science, he anticipated in a general way the scientific results of ages to come. The struggle against obscurantism has still to be carried on. While I am writing this, numerous voices of the ultramontane press come in from abroad which speak in tones of inquisitorial fury of the "Bruno scandal," urging a crusade for the restoration of the temporal power of the papacy. Some of these papers go the length of justifying the burning of the Italian thinker by "the necessity of guarding the church against dangerous heresies." The Salzburger Chronik says: "He that will not listen and obey must be made to feel. In order to save the good the evil must be annihilated. This doctrin is the very basis of the penal law and of the divine command which punishes murder, and which therefore must all the more punish the murder of souls. This is in accordance with human conscience and with justice." Bruno himself foresaw an age of enlightenment, a coming century of progress, when the powers of darkness would sink down to the nether world and the hearts of men be filled with truth and justice. To this prediction refers the proud inscription on his monument: "To Giordano Bruno this memorial has been raised by the century prophesied by him on the very spot where his pile burnt." It may be open to doubt whether this nineteenth century has fulfilled yet all that which Bruno foretold. But whether Galileo's often-quoted word was spoken or not on the famous occasion when the papal church fancied it could stop the rotation of the world by bringing him down on his knees, the truth of his saying, in more than one sense, becomes very apparent: "Eppur si muove!" "And yet it moves!"

Religion Producing Hostility.

Ottawa Letter to New York Herald.

"It is useless to imagin that we will ever cease to be French and Catholic. This monument declares that after a century of separation from our ancient mother we are still French. More than that, we will remain French and Catholic, and our children will remain French and Catholic."

These words sound strangely, do they not? coming from the mouth of the premier of a British province. They were uttered at the unveiling of a joint monument to Cartier and Brebôeuf at Quebec, on St. Jean Baptiste day, by the Hon. Honoré Mercier, premier of the province of Quebec. . . .

In the last century an act gave the French Canadians the free exercise of the Roman Catholic religion, which in that intolerant age was a great concession. With it went the right to collect tithes for the support of the church, and the right to make assessments for ecclesiastical structures and to order the metes and bounds of parishes. The Quebec act is now seen to hav been a fatal mistake.

It is needless to follow the history of the two peoples down through the years. Suffice it to say that under the skilful guidance of the hierarchy the French hav always got the best of every "deal" between the two peoples, and after twenty-two years' trial of confederation, which was to hav cured all the national ills, the two peoples, French and British, are at this moment glaring at each other with murder in their hearts.

The habitants hav increased from sixty thousand at the time of the conquest to two million, eight hundred thousand of whom hav found homes in the United States. They hav invaded the English-speaking province of Ontario on its eastern edge, and pursuing the usual policy they hav converted the public schools in the sections in which they reside into French schools and handmaidens of holy church. Their fecundity is marvelous. The church dwells with emphasis on the scriptural mandate to increase and multiply on the earth. Their standard of living is low, and believing implicitly that God provides for the little ravens, they hasten into matrimony with a want of forethought and preparation that is a wonder to their more cautious Saxon neighbors. In a comparativly few years the still young couple will hav ten or a dozen dark-skinned, black-eyed children gathered about the hearthstone.

Our case should be a warning to neighboring people, more especially the educational aspect of it. One of the things wrested from us by the solid phalanx was the right of Catholics to establish separate schools, although the public schools are non-sectarian and are the perfection of a public school system. The result of this is that Protestant and Roman Catholic children are growing up estranged and apart, occupying different intellectual positions and forming varying conceptions of life. It will be difficult, indeed, to form a homogeneous people on this half of North America under circumstances and conditions such as these.

Our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.

There are a variety of opinions among scholars, investigators, and students of church and Christian history as to the reality, in regard to time and place, personality, and peculiar characteristics as a prophet, ethical teacher, and radical reformer of the Joshua, or Jesus, of the New Testament.

That such a person appeared, at or about the time referred to by Paul and the gospel writers, the early Christian authors generally agree. There is very little reliable evidence in the New Testament, of a positiv and direct quality, that can be adduced. Paul admits that he never saw Joshua in the flesh, so his testimony must all be second-hand, which we know can be but of little value, and is not accepted in a court of law or of common sense.

Paul may be very positiv and emphatic; that does not prove anything more than that he was an ardent enthusiast. It is just as easy to be an enthusiast over a mistake, a beautiful, plausible ideal, as over a plain, practical verity. So that Paul's testimony is not adequate, for he cannot be accepted as a competent witness.

The writers of the gospels were all Greek scholars, living in a country nearly a thousand miles away from Jerusalem, and writing these gospels in another language and more than a century later in time than the occurrences which they purport to relate. Not one of them knew anything, personally, of what they pretend to narrate. Their testimony is all founded on hearsay, traditions, stories, and legends in circulation over a hundred years. And who these gospel authors were nobody knows, for the books were anonymous. We gather these facts and this knowledge from the writings and the testimony of those living at that time and in the following century. These gospels were never referred to, never quoted, and were not known to exist from any evidence that can be found anywhere, till the latter part of the second century. So says Prof. Samuel Davidson, D.D., the ablest Christian scholar, and the very highest authority, of the present century. Intelligent students of biblical and church history are assenting to this, as they can find no authentic testimony for its denial. Chrysostom, a bishop, an author, and Christian scholar in high standing, who lived in the fourth century, affirms that these gospels had no names attached to them for ages, and not till the church, without any knowledge or authority, placed to them the names of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John for the purpose of giving them more weight to aid in their priestly work.

The Acts, the other epistles, and Revelations hav no better or other origin. They hav all been doubted, denied, and rejected as of any historical value by high church dignitaries and the most competent judges at different periods in the history of the church, as well as by many councils which hav rejected or could not agree to adopt them into the canon. The Catholic and Protestant churches could not agree on the authenticity of several of them, and there is no agreement among scholars to-day as to their authoritativ value. In short, the whole New Testament has lost and is losing rapidly since the late revision all that value as authority it once possessed in the eyes of the intelligent, in the church, and among the clergy. As a divine revelation and the "word of God," it is passing where it belongs—into innocuous desuetude.

The Jewish and pagan writers refer to the Judean reformer and to his disciples as a sect which was unpopular among the Jews, and that they and their descendants kept up an organization at Jerusalem for a hundred years, with a succession of rabbis or bishops to the number of fifteen, and till the reign of the emperor Hadrian, who, to suppress the disorders and the rebellious spirit of the Jews, determined to destroy Jerusalem, to scatter and to humble them into submission to the laws.

The Jerusalem church, to escape the persecution, left that city and went east over Jordan, and settled at Pella. But a portion of them were dissatisfied there and longed to return to their nativ city, yet could not while under the leadership of a Jewish bishop, without being subjected to persecution with their turbulent Jewish brethren.

To screen themselvs from the stigma and penalty of the Roman laws for being a sect of the Jews, a portion of them elected a pagan bishop, named Marcus, who induced them to abandon some of their Jewish peculiarities and adopt the pagan notions of the Greeks, which were becoming more popular; then they would be permitted to return and liv on Mount Zion with the pagans, whom the emperor had caused to settle there to prevent the return of the scattered Jews.

These followers of Marcus, the pagan bishop, did return to Jerusalem, and were known to the Greeks as the Nazarene Christians. They apostatized so far from the simple ethics and humble life of Joshua (now called by us Jesus) as to adopt some of the Greek metaphysics, the stories about their prophet, and the miracles that had been ascribed to him by those mythological Greek proselytes.

That portion of the church at Pella which refused to follow Marcus with his pagan superstitions, remained in exile, and for two hundred years continued firm in the simple faith till it melted away or scattered; some joining the Jews, and others the pagans, or remaining alone without coalescing with either.

Up to this period these Jewish disciples were the only representativs of the original simplicity of the life and lessons of their humble prophet. Their testimony and their traditions were all that there was of genuin authority. They spurned with indignation all those stories the Greeks had invented about his being a God or a son of God, or being born of a virgin and endowed with miraculous power. They denied all the romantic stories the Greeks had made up about his life and death, his resurrection and ascension.

Here we hav from the only witnesses or authority that can in any fair sense be depended upon, a positiv contradiction and denial of the forgeries the Greek gospel-writers hav worked into their romantic narrativs of a person of whom they literally know nothing, but whom they were determined to deify, and to elevate among their heathen gods. The pagans that adopted Christianity even in the first century, in the main, never comprehended fully the extreme purity and simplicity of the ethical righteousness of Joshua and his devoted Jewish followers. Our standards of Christianity to-day are not founded on the precepts and practices of this early period of the Christian church, but they are formed from the degenerate and corrupted version of the faiths that are found in the New Testament, as written by the Greeks a century later, with the additions, interpretations, and glosses of after ages.

Gibbon, whose researches were exhaustiv and whose authority is without an equal as an unbiased historian on Christianity, says of these early Christians: "They had separated themselvs from every mode of superstition which was received in any part of the globe. The pure and sublime idea which they entertained of the supreme being escaped the gross conception of the pagan multitude, who were at a loss to discover a spiritual and solitary God, that was neither represented under any corporeal figure or visible symbol, nor was adored with the accustomed pomp of libations and festivals, of altars and sacrifices." He says: "They agreed with the sages of Greece and Rome and their disciples, in their contemplation of the existence of the first cause and in their philosophical devotions." It was from this fact, this reason, that they received the name of Christians, meaning wise men.

They knew nothing of a "Lord and savior Jesus Christ," for they had never seen or heard of him. They had heard of a teacher at Jerusalem, who had taught his disciples those simple, sublime ideas of righteousness and ethical purity. It was reserved for the pagan mythologists of a subsequent century to invent and formulate this romantic title, which professing Christians of to-day bow before with humble gratitude and veneration.

"This blessed son and sent of the father," from Mount Olympus, or somewhere else, who came down from the Chaldean heaven as an atoning savior, and who was decreed to die to effect a reconciliation of man to God, for whose sake we ask God in our prayers to forgiv us, and to let our sins be washed away in his blood—all of this is a Greek myth, that grew out of a martyrdom, which occurred near Jerusalem, some three hundred years previously.

As they did not believe in this supernatural creation of the Greeks, they were the Infidels, the weak-minded, stupid heretics, with whom the more wealthy, aristocratic orthodox would not associate. These earliest Christians or disciples were proscribed, condemned, and abandoned by the pious, conceited, paganized professors of Christianity, who adopted into their creeds the old heathen mythology which we hav expressed now in English in the superhuman title of, "Our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ."

The Infidels of this generation, or those of the first and the nineteenth centuries, in many respects harmonize and resemble each other. They both spurn all creeds and superstitious worships. They both agree with the Greek philosophers and sages, in regard to the attributes of a first cause in a scientific or philosophic sense, and in the practice of the moral virtues to secure salvation.

The early Christians attached great importance to the light and the truth as the means to redeem the mind from the bondage of superstition and error.

Not a few of these impressiv lessons hav found their way into the New Testament. No Infidel in our time could desire to enforce with greater emphasis the absolute and indispensable value of the "light," or mental illumination.

John's gospel makes Joshua say, "God is light." Then of course light was his God. No greater conception or higher exaltation could be given to intelligence or light, than to make it the God we should worship. Then John also tells us that he said, "To this end was I born, for this cause came I into the world to bear witness to the truth." These Infidel gems of course are found mingled with the debris of the superstructures of colossal Greek and Roman superstitions.

In the first public discourse or sermon attributed to Joshua (Jesus), to his ignorant or mentally darkened audiences, he makes light the conspicuous and essential guide for life and conduct. He was making secondary or obsolete the ordinances, laws, and ceremonies, and substituted for these a new basis for action and guidance. He adopted the Infidel's or Freethinker's principles and tactics, and urged his hearers away from all superstition and to act entirely from another motiv than the priest-ridden masses. If they would accept his simple, ethical lessons, and trust in them, well could he say: "Ye are the light of the world." "Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works and glorify your father which is in heaven." To the blind, bigoted, implacable, pious, orthodox Jews we read that he said: "This is the condemnation that light is come into the world and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil. For every one that doeth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reproved. But he that doeth truth cometh to the light, that his deeds may be manifest that they are wrought in [good or] God."

"I am enlightening the world. He that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall hav the light of life."

In speaking of the life principle as manifested in animated nature, that the study of this life force was instructiv, he said: "The life was the light of men." It is the study of this life force among scientists that has brought so much light to this our era.

He said it was open to all, and he believed in all having this scientific enlightenment, for "That was the true light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world." These are specimens of the Infidel arguments he used to induce the orthodox Jews to renounce their superstitions, and to accept reason, light, and intelligence for their religion.

Paul among the gentiles was just as free and fearless in the avowal of his testimony to the light as the only guide to conduct. He was strongly impressed with the belief that he could convert them from their mythology, and that country offered him a field for extensiv missionary labor. He felt that he was "to open their eyes and to turn them from darkness to light and from worthlessness to good;" that this "Christ or wisdom should show light unto the people and to the gentiles." He urged his disciples "to put on the armor of light." He said of this christos, or wisdom, that it will "both bring to light the hidden things of darkness and will make manifest the counsels of the hearts."

He told the Ephesians "to walk as the children of the light" and "to awake, and this christos, or wisdom, shall giv thee light." To the Thessalonians he said, "Ye are the children of the light."

Paul and Joshua did almost or quite apotheosize this light. No Infidel since could do more homage to it, none could show more devotion to it as the only means of obtaining the revelations of truth.

If the modern Infidel wants what the church must accept as high authority for a dependence on science, light, knowledge, intelligence, as his guide, in preference to faith, creed, dogma, doctrin, theology, or superstition in any of its multifarious, stupefying forms or shades, let him appeal to the testimony of these brave advocates and bold exponents of this light, who are nominally honored as the authors and founders, but who, if they were here now, would be the enemies, of our Christian religion.

The light which they glorified as the emblem and symbol of all that was unimpeachable and perfect as a guide, received this reverence from them because its illumination enabled all to see the truth. Without this light the truth can never be discovered.

The highest aim and end of life is to find and liv the truth. Our only exemption from the miseries to which existence is subjected must be by and through the truth. That is, a true knowledge of all that appertains to our happiness, which can be revealed to us through the absolute freedom and fullness of this light. Joshua says: "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." "The spirit of truth will guide into all truth." And he said the mission or purpose of his life was "to bear witness to the truth."

What Infidel can giv a better record or set up a higher claim than that?

In their efforts to bring these ancient writings of the earlier Christians into harmony and to support our paganized system of religion called Christianity, it is remarkable that these testimonies for the light and the truth were left in the text as a taunt and rebuke to all those "who hate the light because their deeds are evil," and are clinging to the darkness and errors of superstition!

These pagan idolators, called the "early fathers of the church," and their successors, the copyists and translators, put in the record and hav imputed both to Joshua and Paul sayings and sentiments so at variance, so contradictory to the many sublime and philosophic lessons they taught, that every sensible reader cannot fail to see they are forgeries or vicious blunders of either ignorant or designing translators. The reader in these times who is so weak or innocent as to ascribe such absurd contradictions to these early teachers fails in a capacity to judge human nature, to discriminate, or to deserve any respect as a biblical critic. The testimony of the late revisers amply confirms this.

"The disciples of the first centuries," as Gibbon says, "repudiated all superstitions, and became obnoxious on this account to both Jews and gentiles. Their attachment and heroic devotion to the simple ethical philosophy taught by the prophet Joshua signalized them as objects of contempt whenever they were found among Hebrew or heathen idolators." They were believers in light, intelligence, wisdom, as their guide and their God. And because they loved this wisdom, in the Greek christos, they were called Christians. On the questions of morals and religion they were in unity and practical harmony with the old school of Greek philosophers, who were called philosophers because they were lovers of this christos or wisdom, not only in morals, but in a broader, scientific, universal sense.

The educated school of philosophers hav perished or passed away, and their descendants hav returned to and become absorbed and obliterated in the ignorant superstitious masses of their countrymen, so that pure Greek philosophy has no longer a representativ class. The sect of Judean philosophers that followed the humble Joshua, but whose tenets were carried by his enthusiastic proselytes to different nations of idolators, where multitudes of converts became their adherents, has also from the same causes faded away. Their ethics were too simple, their lives too pure and humble, to maintain their ground against the massiv hordes of barbarians their patient, humane, and forgiving principles and practices had to encounter. So that practically both schools of Greek philosophy hav now vanished, and in their stead we hav a compound religion represented by various sects, all in mockery claiming the name Christian, but all devotees of ancient Greek and Roman mythology, worshipers of the images and ideals, the names and titles, the lords and saviors, the trinities and personalities, the gods and ghosts of mythology, that our pagan ancestors adopted into their creeds fifteen centuries ago.

There is no religious sect now known that does not cling to some of these superstitions; so there is no sect or class in what is falsely called Christendom that so nearly represents in their abstract professions of faith the early Christians as the unbelievers or the infidels to our present hypocritical, pagan, or heathen idolatry called Christianity. The principles of the early Christians and of modern Infidelity embrace no idolatrous God and no superhuman faith to fight for, and the savage fierceness they inspire does not impel them to the extremes of cruelty and intolerance of one another.

That this infidelity to modern paganism may be worthy and do honor to its profession, by in no sense giving homage to its claims, or that it may not be betrayed into the excesses of blindness which prostrates itself before God as its ideal of goodness in humble adoration while it indulges in wholesale slaughter of fellow-men, or that it may not permit its adherents to participate in the absurdities and crimes that are called Christian virtues, is very important to its honor, its virtue, and fair fame.

That science, light, and truth may bring no disgrace on themselvs by their advocates and exponents is a matter of serious import and earnest necessity in the work of redeeming the deluded from the thraldom of error and the enslaving and corrupting bondage of superstition. The motivs and obligations of the Infidel to be upright and circumspect are imperious and commanding. T. E. LONGSHORE.

What Do We Know About Marcion?

Tertullian, the earliest Latin father, is supposed to hav died between A.D. 220 and 240. But his works were doubtless forged in the fifteenth century; so that what he tells us about Marcion is fabulous.

Irenæus also tells us something about Marcion's doctrins, in his five books "Against Heresies." But this work, which is all we hav of Irenæus save a few "fragments" from his "lost writings," is not in the original Greek, but in a barbarous Latin version. The supposed Greek original is lost, and in regard to the Latin translation the editor of Irenæus's works remarks:

> Dodwell supposes this Latin version to hav been made about the end of the fourth century; but as Tertullian seems to hav used it, we must rather place it in the beginning of the third.

So the ancient Latin translation savors of modern times, when pseudo-Tertullian of the fifteenth century was demolishing Marcion of the second.

But the finding of ancient manuscripts is still going on. In 1842 a Greek manuscript was found on Mount Athos. It was anonymous, and was at first supposed to be by Origen; but the majority of scholars hav now assigned its authorship to Hippolytus, a disciple of Irenæus. It consists of ten books, the second and third of which are wanting, and it begins thus:

> The following are the contents of the first book of "The Refutation of All Heresies."

Eusebius does not name any work of Irenæus "Against Heresies," but he does name, as the last of seven works by Hippolytus, "Against All Heresies."

By this Greek copy of "The Refutation of All Heresies," found in 1842, the editor of the barbarous Latin version of "Irenæus Against Heresies" has restored and corrected much of the text as it is supposed to hav been written by Irenæus near the end of the second century. From this supposititious "Refutation of All Heresies" we get what purports to be a fuller exposition of Gnosticism than is found in "Irenæus Against Heresies" or anywhere else. Five sects of Gnostics are described, all of which preceded Simon Magus. And in Acts viii Simon is described as having resided in Samaria a long time seducing the people by his sorceries. That is to say, he was a practicing magician long before he met Simon Kepha.

Justin Martyr briefly alludes to Simon Magus as coming to Rome in the reign of Claudius, A.D. 41–54. But that is certainly false. Simon Magus was contemporary with Simon Kepha and the other apostles of Jesus, who was stoned and hanged about 75 B.C. Therefore we suspect that Justin did not write in the second century, but in the fourteenth or fifteenth. And with the certainty that some ancient manuscripts are modern forgeries, we are more and more inclined to believe that the learned Jesuit Hardouin was not far from the truth when he maintained that we hav no genuin writings of the fathers, but that all early church history is fiction, except what little is to be found in the New Testament. And this we know is fabulous, contradictory, and uncertain, though doubtless containing some historical facts.

Justin alludes to Marcion twice, saying that he came from Pontus, is still alive, teaches a belief in some other God than the creator, denies that God is the maker of all things, and that the Christ predicted by the prophets is his son. And yet he adds that "all who take their opinions from these men [Simon and Marcion] are called Christians!"

In regard to Paul, he himself tells us that after his conversion he preached in Arabia; then he returned to Damascus, whence he escaped to avoid arrest by the governor under Aretas the king. This was prior to 62 B.C. About 66 B.C Onias, a prophet, was murdered outside the walls of Jerusalem. Onias answers to Stephen—stephanos, "a crown." About 75 B.C. Jesus was stoned and hanged for sorcery, and he answers to Paul's Jesus. Doubtless that Jesus pretended to be the son of God. It was no uncommon delusion. And his followers called him ha mashiach, "the anointed," which was ho christos in Greek, and in Latin should hav been unctus, for there was no such word in the Latin language as christus, until it was fraudulently transferred from the Greek ho christos, "the anointed," as a surname for Jesus.

ANTICHRIST.

The Old Puzzle Can Be Solved.

The author of "Supernatural Religion" throws new light upon it, by the aid of which it may be solved. Mr. Clarke, after admitting that Christianity borrowed from Buddhism, became alarmed at the possible consequences, to Christianity, of the admission, and then endeavored to help the matter by the false assertion that it laid aside what it had borrowed.

Mr. F. M. H. admits that Christianity was derived from Buddhism. Does not that origin make primitiv Christianity older than Paul, especially when Mosheim tells us that Marcion was a member of the Asiatic, which we know was a Buddhist, church?

Mr. H. thinks the epistles of Paul to the Romans, Corinthians, and Galatians are genuin. But a scholar, well known to THE TRUTH SEEKER, tells us there is proof positiv in the Talmud and other Hebrew and Christian writings, that Paul lived about one hundred years before Pontius Pilate. This being the case, Paul could not hav written any epistle that mentions the crucified Jesus of our gospels. And if Paul told the Romans that their faith was proclaimed throughout the world, they must hav been members of that primitiv Asiatic church, to which, two hundred and fifty years afterward, Marcion belonged—Marcion, who took his belief from one gospel and ten epistles of Paul, and preached an aerial Jesus, the son of the supreme God, and the enemy, not the son of Jehovah.

According to Manes, of the third century, who was a believer in Paul, his epistles had been corrupted. How can they now be genuin? The old puzzle must be solved. S. P.

Spirits, Spiritualism.

These are common phrases having their origin in religious sentiment, and beyond this not generally well conceived or understood. In connection with this state of the case it may fairly be said that ignorance, which must hav been the universal condition of man's primitiv existence, gave advent to both superstition and religion, hand in hand. And this state of case has continued on from then until now, the relationship of hypocrisy to ignorance in this connection omitted.

As time advanced intelligence must hav grown and expanded, and the result of this gain, as applied to the more enlightened people, could not hav been else than the introduction of doubt pertaining to the general run of thought as to nature and its marvelous works. A division of sentiment must then hav arisen tending to the dissolution of the social compact, but as nature had inherently fixed upon our race a desire to liv in a close social state, the result on the part of intelligence has been, in the main, to concede to the popular voice, though in the wrong, against its will and opinion, in order to gather to itself the much esteemed benefits to be derived from social intercourse of a pecuniary, directory, or religious character, knowing that a contrary course would sacrifice all.

This line of conduct was and is the gate, the channel, and the guide of all hypocrisy, none the less resorted to since the entrance of higher intelligence over the world. The only gain in the direction of better manhood in this regard is that of the downfall of the ultra-barbarities of all prevailing martyrdoms under the accusations and forms of the Christian religion. But let us not of this age console ourselvs in the consideration of this gain in the assurance of stability. The barbarities alluded to are even now sought to be revived, added to by an equal earnestness to prostrate the rational liberties of the people.

The matter above written is to be regarded as but an introduction to the topics presented, as the latter liv in close relationship to the former in the way of argument.

I may then say, that naturally, out of the conditions above described came the conceptions of spiritual existences with their alleged—I may further say—phantom effects called Spiritualism. All Judea, all superstitious people of that age were inoculated with this mental virus to the, at least, partial removal of Rationalism. They saw gods, angels, spirits, devils, etc., in their diseased imaginations, leaving them in a state to make it known that they communed with them. Hereditary taint seized upon their offspring and the continuance of such superstition never ceased. Not one iota of reason could hav taken part in these conceptions.

Perchance it might hav occurred that hypocrisy delved its way into the counsels of the superstitious in manner and motiv such as has been described, yet a bit more censurable; for it could not be supposed that at any period of time subsequent to the dawn of human existence hypocrisy had failed to make its mark upon prevailing conceptions of a superstitious nature. Let not intelligence deceive itself in the contemplation of any controverted matter by the involuntary workings of the imagination cut loose from the dicta of reason, for the former is ever given to wanton ways, while the latter ever exerts itself—if left free to act—to guide the judgment to true and stable ends.

It is strange, indeed, that the average man inclines to wander in thought amid the bogs and obscurities of unreason, while the way to true and highest intelligence is ever before him, lighted on either side and strewn throughout with the flowers of hope and happiness. So it has ever been. Chargeable in the greatest degree to the introduction and propagandization throughout the world of religious sentiments of one thousand variations, with not one of them able to sustain its pretensions upon a pure basis of reason and common sense.

There remains to be treated the special topics named at the head of our undertaking. For reasons soon to be mentioned it will not be necessary to go further in this than to allude to the outer coat, so to speak, of the endeavor, thus: There is no solid base to the conception of living spirits or to the alleged outputs of what is called Spiritualism. Alcoholic spirits there are; and certain derivations of the term spirit, say spirited, denote activity in life. This is all. Away with phantoms!

As above noted, the necessity of going farther is arrested by the exhaustiv and unanswerable dissection of displays of what are called Spiritualistic phenomena, to be found in THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 25th ult. to the credit of John Prescott Guild, a frequent contributor to THE TRUTH SEEKER. It should be read by all. D.

Men of God.

From the Brookhaven, Miss., Leader.

At a meeting of the citizens of Fair River neighborhood the following resolutions were adopted:

WHEREAS, One W. C. Summers is a licensed minister of the Baptist church, superintendent of the Fair River Sunday school, and lecturer of the Lincoln county Farmers' Alliance; and

WHEREAS, Said W. C. Summers did on the 25th day of June, 1889, at the residence of P. B. Mullen, make an attempt to commit a criminal assault upon the person of Mrs. Jennie Mullen; therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the citizens of this vicinity in mass meeting assembled, do hereby express our indignation against said Summers, and utterly condemn and denounce such his said conduct,

Resolved Further, that we request said W. C. Summers to remove himself forthwith from our midst, as we will not tolerate his conduct.

Resolved, That we, as citizens of Fair River, believe the statement made by W. C. Summers as to the character of Mrs. Jennie Mullen to be an infamous lie and not worthy of the belief of any fair-minded person.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be furnished the newspapers of Brookhaven, with a request to publish same, and a newspapers friendly to law and order be requested to copy.

Christianity and Civilization.

It is time to refute again the falsehood that Christianity is the source of our civilization. This has to be done every now and then.

Definitions of civilization are diverse. We may say in a general way that in certain states contentions between the citizens are settled by law tribunals, instead of by private violence; the habitual occupation is industrial, not warlike and predatory; criminal punishment is mild, not vindictiv or employing torture; government is stable, not continually contested or usurped; it is equitable and popular, not unjust and despotic; and there is knowledge of the resources and laws of nature by which the people satisfy their material necessities, not an ignorant and helpless exposure to the season's rigors and to disease and famin. To designate such states some word had to be chosen, and the word chosen is "civilized."

Take the first above-named characteristic of a civilized state. The administration of law is powerfully forwarded by an elaborate system of communication and transportation—by good and plentiful roads, with railways and telegraphs. The former, good roads, were everywhere established by the great Roman empire of the pagans, and by these roads the Romans were enabled to institute their civilizing system of laws throughout the greater part of the then known world. Upon the rise of Christianity, the care of the roads devolved upon lazy and neglectful prelates, they fell into ruin, public order became difficult to maintain, and unruly chiefs began to wage from their isolated castles the feuds that threw Europe back into barbarism. In what countries does this state of things still prevail? In those lingering most in Christianity—Spain and Greece. In what countries did it soonest disappear? In those earliest advanced in Freethought—France, England, and Germany. With what countries hav we always heard connected the words pirates, banditti, brigands, vendetta, dueling? With Spain and Italy. This country has a section in which Freethought is prominent, the North, and one in which it is almost unheard of, the South—in which does dueling linger? Which do our daily papers report as the scene of murderous family feuds? This particular influence that we hav noticed is only one of the many Christian influences adverse to civil administration; but we must proceed.

If in civilized states the occupation and habits of the people are industrial, not warlike and predatory, let us see whether the most Christian states are the most civilized. The ancient Jews, from whom we get our earliest scriptures, and who are especial Christian models as the people loved by God, were simply infamous gangs of cut-throats. Their whole business was the despoiling of neighboring peaceful nations of their lands and flocks; their continual beseechings to their bloody God were that he would aid them yet more in killing and robbing. During the most Christian period of Europe, the Middle Ages, king everywhere waged war on king, baron on baron, race on race; and war was accompanied by the butchering of prisoners, the sack of cities, and the destruction of wives and children. As Christianity has waned, a movement against war, headed by Rationalists, has grown up; the attendant atrocities hav disappeared, and with the total extinction of a bloody and barbarous religion war must become a thing of the past.

Among the features of civilized states, the next in order that we mentioned was that of mild criminal punishment, not employing torture, and aiming at prevention or reformation rather than at revenge. Any history shows that the most Christian periods were those in which torture was most employed—to a certain degree in civil, and to an unpredecented degree in ecclesiastical, punishment. It could not hav been otherwise, with the spirit of vindictivness fostered as it was by scriptural models of bloody-minded Jews and a fiendishly revengeful God.

One characteristic of civilization, we said, is that in it the government is stable, not continually contested and usurped. By opening the record of God's people, we find nothing but mention after mention of some Jewish gentleman or other killing some other Jewish gentleman and seizing his kingship. During the whole of the Christian ages in Europe the government belonged to whichever among the nobility could raise a big enough force to kill the reigning king, exterminate the whole of his family and line, and seat himself in his place. The Infidel fathers of this republic set up a better model, which is taking effect everywhere else.

In the countries known as civilized, government approaches more or less to being an equitable expression of the will of the governed. But in the most Christian countries and most Christian times there has been the clearest denial that government has its source in the desire of the governed. Point out the most Christian time, the most Christian nation, the most Christian government, and there you hav the most cruel, oppressiv, and despotic time, nation, and government. "Let every soul be subjected to the higher powers. For there is no power but of God. Whoever resisteth the power resisteth the ordinance of God" (Rom. xiii, 1, 2).

Civilization rests in great part upon ability to make use of the materials and forces of nature. The ancients had made a splendid opening in natural investigation and science; Christianity descended upon them in a fatal night of ignorance and superstition, and arts and science perished. For a thousand years blind, priest-led Christians imprisoned, hanged, burnt, and tortured as a magician, a sorcerer, a trafficker with Satan, every man that attempted experiments in chemistry, in physics—in any department of science. There were no instruments to aid production, not even the iron plow and the simplest tools of agriculture; there were no remedies for disease, no means for transportation of produce; famin and pestilence continually desolated whole provinces. Faith, prayer, and miracle were known, and were all that were known, and to doubt them and propose anything in their place was to signal for the pointing finger of the priest and the procession with the rabble to the stake and rack.

If this is what civilization is, and if this is what Christianity is, and if every history contains all these facts, is the statement that Christianity is the source of civilization anything but a lie, told by preachers to be supported and by politicians to cajole Christian fools?

Mr. Corkery and His Bible.

Mr. James Corkery, of South Amboy, N. J., erstwhile teacher of the public school, is a peculiar individual. He achieved notoriety a few months ago by a "symbolical" marriage between himself and one of his little girl pupils, and also by burning up a new suit of clothes because he learned after he had bought them that the material was not American wool, but imported. He also arose in a Catholic church and sought to enter into a dispute with the priest. His eccentricities gave dissatisfaction to some of the school trustees and many others, and at the end of the school year he resigned to prevent trouble. The resignation was accepted four weeks ago, and the vice-principal of the school was appointed to fill the vacancy. The following Friday was the last day of the school, and he improved the opportunity to create another sensation. At the morning session, in the presence of the one hundred and fifty children, the parents of some, and the teachers, Mr. Corkery read the thirty-eighth chapter of Genesis, about Judah and Tamar, and then commented as follows:

"Teachers and scholars, you don't think that what has just been read in your hearing is very nice or very proper. I can trace disapprobation in your faces; you appear as if your modesty had been shocked by the recital, and you hav a right to be offended. All scripture, they tell us, is given by the inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrin, for reproof, for instruction in righteousness, and so forth; but so much cannot be said of the selection just read, for its tendencies are vicious and demoralizing in the extreme. You wrong me very much if you think because I hav read this unsavory extract for you that I approve of such transactions, that I am a blackguard. This venomous decoction I detest as much as you do; I regard it as vile and execrable beyond palliation or excuse; and, as actions speak louder than words, I'll show you by my conduct what I think of it."

Mr. Corkery here tore the offending page from the volume. After he had torn it into small pieces, which he threw into a convenient wastebasket, he thus continued:

"That gilt-edged volume, now disfigured, and labeled 'Holy Bible' on the back, may be accepted as an authoritativ standard of truth and piety in our churches, where hypocrits and thieves abound; but as a text-book of devotion and of godliness it is altogether out of place in the public schools, the immaculate cradle of holy innocents. A lie can not endure forever; and though what I hav done will no doubt be severely animadverted upon, yet I defy all hostil criticisms. I hav within my reach, as a student of the dead languages, proofs the most irrefragable and convincing, both historical and documentary, to show that the entire ill-assorted compend, the work of vagabond Jews, is a barefaced forgery and a fraud, or rather a cunningly devised fable, having for its object the bloody sacrifice of the mass or masses, and the crucifixion or extermination of the innocent, leading them as unsuspecting sheep unto the slaughter.

"These are serious charges, but I am ready to substantiate them; and to this end, resigning my position and taking my life in my hand, I go forth to battle with the monster superstition, flinging defiance at the powers of darkness. To the orthodox believer of every creed, lay or clerical, who may be offended at my remarks, and who burns in consequence to stamp me as a boaster and a liar, I extend a challenge to decide the matter in dispute between us by fair and open controversy before any intelligent audience in the land. Let my challenge be accepted, or let the doctors of divinity for ever hide their diminished heads in shame."

Mr. Corkery now starts upon a crusade against the Bible and the church, claiming that the Lord will provide him the ways and means.

We hav no sympathy at all with Mr. Corkery's enemies, or his friends, either, for that matter, but it seems to us that he is a good-sized crank. His introduction into the school of an obscene story was an outrage upon the scholars.

There is one very good point to the episode, however, and that is that the parents of the children hav learned that the Bible is an unfit book to be read in schools, and if the practice is to be continued they will probably demand an expurgated edition.

Adjusting Christianity.

A Christian paper is in great anxiety that the churches hit upon some method quickly, before it is too late, of "adjusting Christianity to the age without disturbing any of its fundamental principles—truly a delicate and difficult task."

What on earth does this mean? Adjust Christianity? If it is true, we should think the only thing to do would be to adjust the age to it. How many times can church dupes go on reading such things as this over and over without seeing into the self-exposure, the clearest possible revelation of fraud, contained in one such sentence? They are told by their parsons that Christianity is a truth divinely revealed to men, and thus necessarily immutable; in the next moment they hear schemes for "adjusting" said immutable truth so as to gain the people's favor and trade, and yet they go along with eyes unopened and nose as far from smelling a mouse as ever.

Hasn't the whole history of the church been one of adjustment? What does it teach now that it taught in its early age? What text does it now interpret to mean the same as it did once? It has taught from its Bible the falsity of every scientific fact discovered; then afterward it has turned around and proved by the same Bible that all these scientific facts are right. It supported monarchy while monarchy was in favor with the age, and damned republicanism with holy texts; no sooner did republicanism win its fight than the divine book adjusted itself, and, presto! it is the source of our republican government. As long as it could it encouraged celibacy as the state most pleasing to God, upon which we should all enter if we could force ourselvs to, if possible letting the race perish; it filled convents and monasteries and caves with sour and gloomy ascetics; presently a monk and a king wanted wives, natural instincts refused to be mutilated any longer; and now we hav the "Christian home," "Christian motherhood," etc. Before 1865 the "divine word" fitted perfectly with slavery in the United States; but the slavery was abolished and so the "word" was adjusted. At the discovery of evolution that doctrin, as poor Darwin found to his cost, was clearly false by proof of the inspired book; yet the doctrin is all right now that it has been adopted by an overwhelming force; judicious adjustment does quite away with all conflict—in fact, evolution was first taught by the Bible itself.

"Without disturbing any of its fundamental principles." It cannot be said that there is any fundamental principle of the creeds that has not been altered. A humane generation has grown up and been shocked by certain passages, and more intelligent city pastors hav accordingly discovered that those passages are not inspired—only the others. Thus the dogma of the inspiration of all the scripture is broken. The garden of Eden story, the fall and atonement, hav been adjusted by the pastors of advanced congregations into "poetic myths—allegories, not to be taken literally, but as symbolizing" so and so. Hell is far gone in the cities; it is starting to go in the country. Some creeds hav been openly adjusted; those that stand are taken in a different sense. It does not signify to point out that the words are the same; words are nothing in themselvs; the thing to be considered is the meanings attached to the words, the conceptions called up by the words. And those old meanings, old conceptions, are now almost never called up, almost never dwelt on or insisted on.

Then the question should arise in every mind of any shrewdness, What is there constant amid all this change? what remains enduring and fundamental under all this adjustment? We hear of business enterprises, manufactures, money-making schemes, being adjusted; but how can a divinely revealed body of truths be adjusted? If divinely revealed, it must be unchangeably true—as true at the first as it ever can be. If one will push that question, What is there constant amid all the change? he will arrive at this answer. There is just one thing constant, one thing that remains, whatever else has to go, and that is—the determination to be supported by the people, and ride them to the end of time.

The Shop Across the Way.

It is time there was an end put to the absurd reverence with which the people regard the operations of churchmen. There are some men in this country that do a certain business, and hav a certain product to sell. The men are called pastors and the like; the business is church work, and the product they offer for sale is their talk. People hav been duped into such a reverence for the thing that we suppose it is impossible to get a Christian to regard the question as it should be regarded, but we will ask nevertheless: How in the name of common sense does this business stand on any different footing from any other business? Why should we giv these men that want to sell this talk any privileges over men that want to sell any other kind of talk, or that want to sell groceries, coats and vests, or pigs' feet?

Yet these men hav secured the most outrageous exemptions and privileges. In industrial circles we hear now and then much to-do over some one business being given an unfair advantage over others. It seems always to hav been an inclination of tradesmen to intrigue with government to the end of securing immunities, assistance, or monopolies. So this trade, gospel-selling, has naturally tried also. It has secured these unjust advantages to an extent monstrous and outrageous; and what we want people to do is to look on its schemes and unjust advantages just as they do on those of any other business, and stop them. We want people to get rid of that foolish reverence that prevents them from seeing this concern's methods and injustices in their true light—prevents them from seeing that they are nothing more than the methods and injustices that any other business employs every time we are foolish enough to giv it the chance.

Gospel-selling givs its sharp business dodges, and solicitations to government for advantages, another name than the ordinary one. It asks government to kindly suppress all rivals, and then takes credit for having done a deed "holy, spiritual, blessed, lofty." It coolly prefers the request that government imprison or kill any rivals that want to set up in the same business, and then says it has done a deed the most high, necessary, glorious, and moral conceivable.

Let people learn to discard the old language about it, and when they view it instigating against a rival, see in it nothing more than a shop berating "the shop across the way."

Let us hav no more fine language about closing theaters and other places of entertainment Sunday. The closing of them has nothing to do with "morality," with "decency, with "sobriety"—except to injure them all. Going to such places enlarges the intellect, raises the spirits, refreshes the toilworn, and warms and broadens the sympathies. It is good for morality, and every thinking man knows it. The whole gist of the matter, stripped of the fine language that preachers hav befooled people into using, is that going there lessens attendance at church and takes money out of the preachers' pockets. It is nothing to use grand terms about—it is simply a matter of "the shop across the way."

People don't "debase their minds" or "neglect higher duties" by staying at home and reading Sunday newspapers. Acquiring knowledge elevates the mind, and it itself is our highest duty. Let the plain truth be told—the practice doesn't fill the preachers' bellies.

The Sunday opening of art museums and libraries is said to be "unseemly," "improper," "unrighteous," and so on. Translated from this funny mystical language, this means only that it diverts trade to the shop across the way and doesn't enable parsons to get so much roast meat, feather bedding, and fine furniture.

The same of Sunday railroading. The people that run some businesses hav been fools enough to let the people that run other businesses solicit government into suppressing the former businesses.

Then there are the scientists and Rationalists. They are the worst of all. If people commence to trade with them our business is gone at once. Their goods are of such a nature as not only to serve in place of ours, but to insinuate the outrageous idea that ours are humbug—we see our old customers smiling as they come out of the shop across the way. This calls for the very fiercest language in all our collection of curses for rivals. This calls for the strong hand of the state at once.

These reflections are suggested by a paragraph in a Catholic journal:

> "We warn our Catholic people against the venders of certain superstitious prayers alleged to hav been found in the grave of our Lord; also, of 'a letter written by our Lord Jesus Christ and found fifty-three years after the blessed savior's death,' etc., etc. Now all this stuff is silly and superstitious, and should receive no countenance whatever from Catholics. Burn all such trash and kick from your doors the venders thereof. We hav surely prayers enough approved of by the church without having recourse to such superstitious twaddle."

What could afford a more hearty laugh to one initiated into the true meaning of this sort of thing? Can they giv a particle of proof of any superior worth of their prayers over those offered by their competitors? "Burn all such trash"—buy only our trash, else the money won't get in our pockets. "Kick from your doors the venders thereof"—certainly; if necessary, burn them. "We hav prayers enough approved by the church without having recourse to such superstitious twaddle." Buy Smith's Blacking. Go to Jones for clothing. Get only so-and-so's Cough Syrup. Trade only at the old-established stand.

We doubt that any mind, brought up as we all hav been under delusiv reverence for all these sharpers' schemes and their sounding cant, can take in at once a clear, full, realizing idea of the monstrousness of the fraud and outrage by which these tradesmen procure their tremendous government support against their rivals.

A Distinction.

Men must distinguish, in essaying to estimate what Christians and their belief are good for in the world, between true Christians, Christians properly so called, on the one hand, and on the other hand the persons known as Christians in the present age. A person having heard a denunciation of Christians and Christianity as obstructiv to science, might then observe the church-members about him and their life and doings, and come to the conclusion that the denunciation was over-condemnatory. He might object: "But I see these Christians that you say are opposed to science and knowledge seeking education every day, procuring reading-matter, organizing scientific lyceums, handling scientific instruments. How can your statement that they antagonize and hinder such activities be true?"

A little thought should enable such person to make a distinction that would render the matter clear. The simple fact is that such persons as those observed by him are not Christians. It signifies little by what name they continue to call themselvs; names are nothing. What we are to estimate them by is, the whole body of their disposition, habits of thought, and actions. Now, Christianity prescribed a certain system of dispositions, habits of thought, and actions; this was followed by certain men in the Dark Ages, followed rigidly and in its entirety; and those men were Christians. To them the name really applies, and to them only; to them only can we correctly look for the effects of Christianity in practice. The men passing as Christians now, we affirm, are not like those men, are not Christians; and to use the same name to denote both is to continually giv rise to that confusion of thought which it is the purpose of this article to disentangle. We hav affirmed that they are not Christians; and we affirm that they are Rationalists. That is, in the main. They are nine-tenths Rationalists. Nine-tenths of their thinking and conduct is based on the principles of Rationalism, and directly and flatly in defiance of Christian rule. What is bad in them is Christian; what is good, is Rationalistic. Let anyone puzzled look back in history and he will see the genuin Christians opposing education, burning scientific works along with their writers, destroying libraries and scientific instruments. After we hav lost tens of thousands of lives in trying to get the superstition out of believers and some sense and science into them, and hav got them in the tolerable condition of to-day, nine-tenths Rationalistic, it is rather hard on us to hav some look at our reformed Christians, our partially sane products, and tell us that he doesn't see but that they're all right—doesn't see why we need hav so much turmoil over them. There is not a scientific book that Christians are seen using that does not contain theories for which his predecessors hav burnt men and tortured them; a Christian cannot open his mouth to pronounce any received and every-day maxim of modern physical knowledge or modern government or morals, without flatly contradicting the affirmations of his scripture.

Then let everyone distinguish: Every time a Christian is seen doing a thing sensible, he is doing a thing obediently to his reason, which faculty the scripture expressly condemns; every time he works for a thing instead of praying for it, he is violating Christ's injunction; his every humane word against violence, robbery, or slavery is blasphemously antagonistic to the examples of the Old Testament; every step he takes toward bettering our worldly condition is in willful disobedience of divine commands. When he is seen doing any of these things, let it be understood that he is doing them as a Rationalist; and that he does them as a Rationalist, after centuries of the opposit course, only because we hav endured generations of slaughter, torture, persecution, and abuse to persuade, force, and beat it into him.

And the reason we are still working at him is that there even still lingers in him a leaven of the old superstition, which yet works the saddest results, and he is dangerous as long as it remains in him. It may at any time spread and resume its old power; we are not safe till the last atom of poisonous stuff has been rooted out never to return; and this is what we are trying to do.

THE Concordia Blade tells a good story. Mr. Walker, cashier of a bank in St. Joseph, lately went to visit Mr. Obendrof of the First National bank at Centralia. He was invited to Mr. Obendrof's house for dinner, and was such a solemn man that Mr. Obendrof imagined he must be religious. When dinner was ready, Mr. Walker was invited to ask a blessing, which he did, after some hesitation and blushing. Mr. Obendrof congratulated himself on his shrewdness in not offending his religious guest, and a few weeks later went to St. Joe, and was invited to dinner with Mr. Walker. Mr. Walker thought it would never do to offend a religious man like Mr. Obendrof, so he invited him to ask a blessing. Mr. Obendrof blushed and hesitated, but finally mumbled out something that was accepted as a blessing. After dinner, while riding about the city, they talked on religion, when it developed that both men were Freethinkers, and that they had never before asked a blessing at dinner.

Letters from Friends.

NATIONAL CITY, June 24, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: We are very much pleased with the paper, and out of all on our list THE TRUTH SEEKER is read first and last. It givs so much room for thought, while the ordinary secular paper is dross, policy-moving, and so much inclined to toady to the cheeky ministers, who should all know that they are in a foul and treacherous business.

Yours truly, A. N. BURGESS.

TRUXTON, N. Y., July 2, 289 E.M.

MR. EDITOR: Continue sending me THE TRUTH SEEKER, as I think it one of the best papers that can be read by man or woman. It is all I can wish for. I received a letter from W. F. Jamieson, Esq., asking if there are Liberals enough in Truxton to sustain a Liberal course of lectures, and in reply would say there are Freethinkers enough, but how "liberal" they are I don't know. I will write to him after I see some who, I think, would help. JOHN DEAN.

FREDONIA, N. Y., June 20, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find money to pay toward service already ably done and for that which may come, in good riddance of stale theology, which has always stood and lurked in the highways of every progress to a better and higher civilization.

To hope and trust effectually means to stand up erect, and aid in keeping the flag floating above the cross. It is high time every man came to the rescue. PLINY SMITH.

CELINA, O., June 29, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $10 for four new subscribers and the renewal of myself to the best paper on earth, THE TRUTH SEEKER. And you may count on me for a lifetime subscriber. I am a radical Infidel, and glory in the honor, for I consider it an honor to denounce superstition and Christian dogmas. My family are Infidels, and we hav been working for the cause in this place. We hav about forty brought over to our way of thinking, and will try to send in some names in the near future.

HENRY T. NIOCUM.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., July 7, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Did God do all that lay in his power to avert or mitigate the horror at Johnstown? If so, is he then infinitly powerful? Did he not do all he could? Is he then infinitly merciful? The above questions I put to a lady the other day and the answer was: "Oh, they were all wicked and God destroyed them." But I asked her if her own mother, her good mother, had been there on a visit, and was drowned, what would she think of God's goodness to her mother? She did not like my mode of reasoning, and triumphantly answered me by exclaiming: "Oh, some people would like to tear God from his throne!" JAMES WATT.

BOYNE FALLS, MICH., June 13, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: It is said by some here that say they know, that the Johnstown flood was in consequence of the wickedness of the people, but I think there must hav been some that God must hav loved, and that it might hav been to chasten them and not to punish the wicked. Therefore, I thought I would continue to take your paper, as you might know something about it; at least, as much as any of us, and would express an opinion that might giv a little light on the matter. My honest opinion is that it was on account of the heavy rains and the breaking of the dam.

When will people learn to think, or not to think foolishly?

Yours for Universal Mental Liberty, W. P. DAVOLL.

PARIS, ILL., July 7, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I offer my sincere congratulations on the just and able manner in which you handled the communications of your "two respected friends" in your last paper. Your reasoning is right and the strictures are just and timely, meeting the cases of others who would hav THE TRUTH SEEKER run in accordance with their restricted views. You are right. Sit down very hard on anyone who would hav the grand old TRUTH SEEKER run in the interest of any party or sect, religious or political. The idea of THE TRUTH SEEKER throwing "mud" cannot be truthfully held by persons familiar with the facts. I hope your "friends" are not addicted to the practice of "mud-slinging."

MR. EDITOR: The Bible: Is it a truth or not? on this question the whole prosperity of the human race depends. Our Christian friends tell us that God is all-wise; that whatever he sends us is for our good. According to this we should not kill the potato-bugs. I find Christians and scientists are killing alike. Science says if we had not killed a potato-bug this season we should not hav any potatoes to eat again. Science says, stop raising potatoes a few years and the potato-bug will cease to exist. If I were a Christian I must believe that I should not kill potato-bugs, as the Bible says thou shalt not kill. I as a scientist believe we should not kill our fellow-man. It has always been the practice of the Christians to kill their fellow-man, while their profession has been, thou shalt not kill. A SCIENTIST.

DAYVILLE, CONN., July 1, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1 in pay for TRUTH SEEKER. I could not keep house without it. Heston's pictures are splendid. The last one was fine. I don't think the faithful will try to drink poison or play with snakes if their faith is ever so strong. It would take holy Saint Patrick to do that.

There is not much religion in this place. The churches are poorly supported. At the last game of baseball that was played here the priest got a pair of black eyes and a bloody nose from one of his dear children. So you see how they honor their holy father. I am the only one that takes THE TRUTH SEEKER here. I hav tried to get some to take it, but can't. There are plenty of Freethinkers but they don't seem to want to subscribe. I lend my paper every week, and some of them enjoy reading it. I may get a subscriber yet.

Yours for truth, MARTHA HART.

MR. EDITOR: The whole South are notorious as followers of a dead crank who lived eighteen hundred years ago, and a very limited account of him. They fall down and worship to a degree no other section of the country can compare with. Here in southern Mississippi there is the most Christianity and the least honor of any portion of the United States. I hav even seen a man here arrested for picking blackberries on Sunday. But should he go to church and leave a whip, rubber coat, or umbrella, or any trifling thing in his buggy or on his horse ten to one it is gone when he comes out. Everyone asks God for help here and they are the poorest people I ever saw anywhere; just one remove from the savage. All are good church-members, and any of them will go on the witness-stand and swear black is white.

The negroes are flocking from the rice plantations on the banks of the Savannah to follow a Northern white crank who is posing as Christ, falling down on their knees and worshiping him wherever he approaches, preparing for an early march to Canaan, and waiting for carloads of angels' wings to be brought them over the white man's railroad to fly away to the promised land. They are leaving crops, belongings, and homes. A FREETHINKER.

LOOKPORT, N. Y., June 30, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find check for $5.50 to renew my subscription for two years. I send the extra fifty cents for a book which I think you hav for sale, entitled, if I mistake not, "Men, Women, and Gods," by Miss H. Gardener. I am now almost eighty years of age. Do you really know that after I cease living here I shall dissolve into the elemental constituents that now make up my individuality? It seems almost too bad to be snuffed out like that when I hav lived here so long. My capacity for acquiring knowledge and intellectual enjoyment is as good as ever. If you do not know, what is your belief? Is it, in your opinion, all guesswork? I think it is a miserably mean thing to die guessing. I can afford to lose all the popular ideas of God and the devil, heaven and hell, golden wings and golden streets, but I hav such a strong desire to continue to exist somehow and somewhere in this beautiful universe that I feel like swearing or praying every time I read some of the labored arguments to prove the endless sleep, which come to us in THE TRUTH SEEKER. With all the strong and ever-increasing love I hav for those I hav seen pass away, the ardent desire and sweet hope of again seeing their kind and sympathetic faces, are they indeed dust and ashes? Whence this mockery, this cheat, this lie? It chills me to the very bones thus to liv with all these hopes and aspirations for more than three-quarters of a century, and at last lie down and in a few moments become extinct. ISAAC ALLEN.

CHICAGO, ILL., July 13, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Can I be allowed to say amen to the tone of John Downes's letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 6th? I think he hits the nail on the head when he says, "Let the motto of all lovers of our country be, No more suffrage to any foreigners. Keep them from voting, and destroy the venomous sting of the church." While I hav no objection to foreigners coming here to seek a home for themselvs and little ones, who will adopt our country as their own and help to protect it from all its foes, I hav serious objections to any alien coming here to steal the livery of our United States to serve the Roman church (or any other church or creed) and carting away our Constitution and laws in the hearse of Jesuitism. The majority of foreigners who come here bring with them the idea taught, that their first obligation of obedience is due the church and its dictates. With the pope of Rome to decree and Cardinal Gibbons to manipulate, what would our country come to? Even now it is not safe to utter the words I am penning, nor for you, Mr. Editor, to publish, as the principle that has shown itself in the assassination of Dr. Cronin of our city is abroad in the land, and were all the foreign population of our land like many of them, we would now be snuffing the fumes of burning heretics. For between the politician (the Jesuit of politics) and the Jesuits of the Roman church our land is in danger, as they would stab to the heart our Constitution, debauch our public schools, and ruin the virtue of our government. The importation of ignorance and lawlessness, free of duty, is the bane that is poisoning the vitals of our nation and sapping away the life of our citizens. A. D. SWAN.

POCAHONTAS, ILL., July 10, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed twenty-five cents for "Liberal Hymn Book." I am truly glad that the truth still livs. I hav been thinking a long time I'd say a word about Spiritualism. Those communications, both pro and con, that hav previously appeared in our paper, remind me of sportsmen shooting at so long a range that they knew they had not reached the target, and no one knew which came the nearest. Although I was raised to believe in spirits, I hav for many years had no sympathy in the cause. If I understand the meaning of the word spirit, it is certainly nothing. It is either a part of God or of the devil, which are great nothings. Spirits are invisible, and yet our Spiritual friends see them. They are not tangible, but yet they are felt. They hav no organs of speech, yet they converse freely. They hav no body, yet they write.

'Tis a pity that men and women of such talent will fool away this short life, where so much good could be accomplished, practicing such superstitious legerdemain. It must be either for amusement or for gain. And, worse than all, there's no philanthropy about such a narrow, selfish scheme. Those few who profess to be the recipients of those communications cannot claim to be of greater moral and intellectual worth than many who are slighted, so upon what grounds can these manifestations be justified? And if not justified they should be condemned. Yours, for liberty, philanthropy, and fraternity, EX-REV. JOS. N. MAXEY.

GLOVERSVILLE, N. Y., July 3, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I hav a little circumstance to tell you, which may interest you. I was walking past a church the other evening, and made a few remarks in regard to the sanity of the people who would go and listen for a couple of hours to a clergyman and then claim that they do most emphatically believe what they hav been listening to. As I was speaking an aged gentleman came up behind me, and asked what I meant. I told him, whereupon he started on a long discourse, and before he had spoken thirty words he left his theme and commenced on temperance. I could not get him to leave the temperance question, so I asked him what temperance had to do with Christianity originally. He answered, "Everything." And he claimed that the church founded temperance, until I mentioned the Washingtonians to him. Then for the third time he evaded the argument I gave, and told me about his promising a quarter of lamb to a man if he would abstain from all intoxicating drinks for one year. The man stopped drinking and received the quarter of lamb. The old gentleman became so excited over the lamb that he could only repeat the story over and over to me. And I left him, as it was very uninteresting to talk to a man who could only repeat an old story that had nothing to do with what charges I made against his religion.

He is a strong advocate, and has been for years, of the temperance cause, and what did he ever do in that regard, or ever try to do, while he had a chance—and he certainly must hav had a chance, as he signs his name "Hon."?

I will not mention any names, as he has made no public attack on me as yet; but should he, I think THE TRUTH SEEKER will hav a few items for publication.

I simply write this because I feel in a communicativ mood, and to show you that there is another old fogy in the world, and one more strong and radical advocate of free thought and speech and common sense. W. P. LOOKLIN.

TORONTO, July 6, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I should like to ask through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER—for I do not suppose a Christian journal would devote its sacred columns to the propounding of such a question—why the almighty does not exert his omnipotent power in such cases as the Johnstown catastrophe for instance. We often hear him likened unto a father who guards his child with a watchful and careful eye, but I would like to hear of the father who in his right senses would sit calmly on his selfish throne as God does and see one or a number of his children hurled into the jaws of grim death without making an effort to rescue them, but instead glare at them with a keen eye of satisfaction, and gloat over the scene as though he gloried over such horrible exercise, and then try to frighten those who remain into the belief that the only way they can secure a harp and a pair of wings with which to soar away to everlasting happiness is to praise him day and night for allowing the lives of unsuspecting victims to be taken in such a cruel and cowardly manner, when he could hav prevented it but did not.

Is it any wonder that the Christian forces are battering down their own fortresses and annihilating their own army, when under command of such a relentless and bloodthirsty general? And they are evidently breaking down every barrier to Freethought, which in the great march of progress is fast gaining the ascendency over wrong for which it is striving, and which will eventually attain an eminence from which it can look down upon the vanquished forces of orthodoxy, and proclaim to all the world that error and superstition hav been obliterated and truth and right are wearing illustrious crowns.

When the imaginary fire and smoke which hav belched forth out of the mouths of roaring Christian guns for centuries hav cleared away; when the ranks of superstition hav been broken and the forces scattered, and the shackles of mental and social slavery hav been broken off, then will the unmistakable evidences of the destruction of the high walls of superstition be manifested, and the glorious dawn of a reign of unhampered liberty, of unfettered freedom of thought and speech, break upon us, and a new and brighter sun will shine upon emancipated humanity. Wars will cease, bloodshed and strife will be practically unknown; and as a high standard of education will be the aim of all, every intelligent man and woman will become a benefactor and instrumental in reclaiming the human race. J. B. VAIL.

IPAVA, ILL., July 15, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: The Fourth of July celebration in Ipava was better than any citizen anticipated. The most sanguin did not expect such a fine time, nor did they expect to see so many people present. All was in harmony. The music, the reading of the Declaration, the oration, the tribute to the grand old flag, the eagle, the park dinner, all went to make up one grand, beautiful picture. Every heart seemed to be throbbing with patriotism. All was pleasant until about 5 P.M., when the "Holiness Band" came in on Main street, marched into the thickest of the crowd, and commenced singing psalms. They were quietly asked to go to the park, but did not go; then they were commanded to disperse, as they were obstructing the public highway. Still they were inclined to remain, calling the officers of the day a drunken mob for trying to interfere with God's work. Now it seems that many good people hav come to the conclusion that God has some very poor specimens of humanity working for him, and they hav become tired of being called fools and drunkards by such people. In fact, such acts and such people are an insult to decent religion, an eyesore to good citizenship, sickening to creation, and last, but not least, it is an insult to the national bird to interfere with his flight on the Fourth of July. These holiness people are not patriotic. They do not believe in the Declaration, there is not God enough in it. Jehovah they think is left out. One of this same band was egged out of a neighboring town for condemning the soldiers and citizens for laying flowers upon the dead soldiers' graves. They are a part of the God-in-the-Constitution party. They are trying to elevate the cross above the flag. George Washington said: "This government is in no sense founded on the Christian religion." This is a secular government, recognizing no religion but tolerating them all if celebrated in order and decency. Ignorance cannot on national holidays erect their "guide board" on the public highway and there mistake cheek for authority, loud talk for wisdom, and excitement for inspiration. There is a time for everything and a place for everything. The time to fly the American eagle and pay tribute to the stars and stripes is the Fourth of July. And when the eagle flies the highest and the flag floats upon the breeze Washington, Paine, and Jefferson become immortal, and every man, woman, and child that are protected beneath the grand old flag, the emblem of liberty—if they know from whence their liberty came—will hold the above heroes more sacred than all else. They kindled the fires of independence which put out the sulphurous fire of darkness, and should be lauded to the sky.

The soul-savers were taken in charge by the officers and marched to the public square, and turned loose. Some of the most superstitious expected to see the flag rent from top to bottom and the dead come forth and walk, but not so. The grand old emblem still floats and the sun still shines, and the Ipava people are happy. C. S. RANDOLPH.

LAWRENCE, KAN., July 15, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: When we learn to feel that we are responsible beings, and do what is right for the love of right; doing good for its own reward, and not for the fear of eternal punishment or the vengeance of a wrathful God, then, and not till then, shall we hav a just appreciation of ourselvs, our fellow-beings, and our creator.

I, for one, could not die with a clear conscience, if during life I should attribute to God all the cruel wars, bloodshed, and torture—with guillotin, the gibbet, and fagot—all the atrocities recorded in the Bible and through history, and which are said to hav been executed according to the divine command of God, but which were the outgrowth of vicious, conniving, or mentally deranged people, and palmed off on the ignorant masses, who, under oppression and tyranny, gladly caught the thread of hope that somewhere in the future there might be a heaven of rest for the poor and oppressed of this world, whose lives had been one brief scene of grief and wrong here. They also conceived that it would be a fine thing to invent a place of torture for their oppressors; so they invented the sulphur pit, to which they hav consigned not only their oppressors, but also the best and noblest types of the human race. All that did not believe their absurd dogmas, all that dared to think for themselvs with that brain given them by the creator, were doomed to eternal perdition. But, for my part, I would rather go to eternal perdition in company with Galileo, Socrates, Paine, and all the list of ancient and modern thinkers than be consigned to the orthodox heaven one hour amongst the lying, grasping priestcraft and ignorant, cringing cowards, thieves, and murderers that hav lived like fiends of darkness and imps of Satan, that hav offered up their prayers on the gallows to a creator that they think has nothing else to do than listen to human babble, and grant pardons to those who are too mean to liv like true men and too cowardly to die.

MRS. H. H. AHLSTROM.

PALMYRA, N. Y., June 5, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I see that the gospel-bangers turn all things to prove the goodness of God. The Johnstown flood was one of God's blessings, and next fall the people will be requested to assemble in their respectiv houses of worship and thank him for it. Salt is as good as sugar to sweeten with if you only think so. They can prove their religion to little children and little minds. Those who fish in rain-barrels for whales and in superstition for ghosts believe all they say. They stand up in their dignity and long faces and tell their dupes that God has created certain laws of nature, and they hav to work the way he has planned—he does not interfere with them. But it appears he did at the Johnstown flood, for he saved an old wooden image of his ma in the Catholic church—although he didn't save the church. That, I suppose, was of more consequence than the thousands that perished by the flood. God is so good and merciful and can do everything and dislikes sin and suffering, and your prayers will be answered if you pray in faith believing. Did not that poor little child on the raft believe, and all those others who asked God to help them? But they went to their death, and God was about as much help to them as the horn on the moon. And soon after in Ireland, fifty or more little innocent children were maimed or killed in a railroad collision, and they were his own good little Sunday-school scholars. How long will the poor dupes of religion keep worshiping a myth of old heathen idolatry, instead of putting their trust in themselvs to overcome the destroying power in nature by common sense and science?

I love the good, the beautiful, the just, the grand, and the noble in all nature, but I do not love or reverence a heartless God. I despise that heartless monster that makes the innocent suffer for the guilty, and creates animal life so it can exist only by devouring other living substances, that are in pain by being tortured and killed—one animal laying traps to catch its own fellows or other species, and the animal man not exempt from that heartless cruelty. When misfortune and sickness come to us the sky-pilots say that whomsoever God loveth he chastiseth. According to that he loves everybody and he has been on the love-path quite considerable lately, and has loved many of them to death. I sincerely hope he will not place his affections on me very soon, as my ambition is to help spread the gospel of Freethought a little longer on earth. I hav no ambition to sing his praises and goodness around the great white throne.

I find that the Freethinkers were the only ones who contributed to the building of that monument to science, and the murdered advocate of it, poor Bruno, although his knowledge was a help to education, and to the good of all classes, Protestants and Catholics. And even God did not know the shape he had made his own earth in until he was told by that martyr to science and Freethought. No, they could not contribute one cent to a monument to progress, but the religious fanatic will giv his last dollar to help build a monument to one of the old, ignorant, selfish, and degraded saints of Christianity, doubly dyed and steeped in debauchery and crime. H. P. MARSH.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., July 15, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Memory reminds me that some months ago a correspondent requested that special attention should be paid to science in THE TRUTH SEEKER; and suggested Matter, Motion, and Planetary Formation as an appropriate subject, and briefly stated the popular theory. Being of an obliging disposition, I will suggest that science is knowledge; hence, unless theories are the logical import of known facts, they are obviously not science, but vagaries. Judging popular theories by that definition, I lost confidence in them in early youth and hav not found it yet.

Memory suggests that a Boston man named Fisk was the original author of the popular theory that all matter was primarily a mass of liquid fire of intense heat, etc. The theory was first published in a small book that I read about fifty years ago, and it was subsequently elaborated and republished as a divine revelation—probably by the spirits—through the mediumship of A. J. Davis, the trance orator. By reading the preface or introduction of the Davis book, I learned that the original author of the theory was one or the whole of the committee who had charge of Mr. Davis and the spirits, and of the elaboration business.

Friction and combustion are the only known cause of heat. The heat caused by friction is but sufficient to ignite combustible substance, and combustion rapidly decomposes the substance acted upon and renders it incombustible. Therefore, if matter exists eternally, it could not possibly hav been primarily intensely heated, if heated at all. For there can be no heat without friction, nor friction without motion—should I add, nor motion without life, some of your critics might pertinently inquire: Then how about the motion of a falling dead body? Hence, it appears that life, in the usual acceptation of the term, is not an absolute necessity to motion; for decomposition and recomposition is motion, but the friction is not sufficient to cause perceptible heat. Hence it is obvious that all matter was primarily cold and lifeless, infinitly expanded and apparently motionless, until its inherent properties were evoluted into activ being; then motion and planetary formation began.

Having ascertained the primary condition of matter, the cause of motion and planetary formation is the next problem that presents itself for solution; and when we hav found a cause of motion, we shall hav found the great universal cause and law of all motion. For nature is a strict domestic economist, who will not tolerate such an extravagant superfluity as two causes of the same or like effect; for we could never determin with scientific certainty to which cause the effect should be attributed. Hence confusion that would make science impossible.

Though it is generally accepted as an axiom that nature abhors a vacuum, I am inclined to doubt; for there is more vacuity than anything else in nature, and she makes no fuss about it that I can perceive. All is tranquil and lovely out yonder in vacuity. Therefore it is obviously not vacuity but antagonism that nature abhors, and hastens to establish unity, tranquillity, and repose. Antagonism makes motion a necessity to self-preservation; hence it is a sufficient cause and law of all motion. Therefore, when the inherent properties of matter were evoluted into activ being, all matter of antagonistic properties in proximity united and produced compound formations of every degree of ponderosity, causing motion and commotion until centers of ponderosity, that are usually called centers of gravity, were formed, around which all matter arranges itself in the order of its ponderosity, and planets and planetary systems were formed as speedily as gravitation could form them. There is no scientific reason that I can perceive, why all the formations that compose our planet should not hav been simultaneously formed and deposited by the common law of formation and gravitation, instead of being formed and deposited at different times and by diverse methods, as some theorists absurdly suppose.

I hav failed to find any evidence of, or necessity for, such a property in matter as attraction, especially not as a cause of motion. The effect of antagonism is analogous to that attraction is supposed to cause; hence the attraction delusion. Nor hav I found any indications of spirit organisms, or of any spirits but the inherent properties of matter that are inseparable from matter. Hence, I think it pertinent to inquire whether spirit is an organic and personal individuality, like the Christian's God, or an inorganic and universal property. Spiritology involves the question of whether the facts that are known to exist in nature, or facts that are known to be manufactured by art, are the most reliable authority on questions of natural phenomena. I would not believe the existence of spirit organisms should I see, hear, and feel them; for I scientifically know them to be a delusion, and that my physical senses and imagination are liable to deceive me unless subjected to strict supervision of reason. Thought being but imagination, you will please note that I am not an advocate of free thought, but of free discussion and investigation that demands a reason that no school or sect of spiritologists are prepared to giv, but insist on our accepting manufactured, artificial facts, notwithstanding the facts presented by nature to the contrary. J. A. TUTTLE.

NICKERSON, KAN., July 13, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: It can be truly said that the world has but just started upon the right road to progressiv civilization. Although we hav required over four thousand years as experience in which to discover the true base for the structure of human science, it does not follow by any means that the final perfection of that science will now be so long delayed as to cause dismay in the hearts of the noble class of writers and thinkers of this day.

As we look back over the vista of time, even though but partially acquainted with the history of nations and peoples, their beliefs and their governments, our blood stops in our veins, curdled by the page of crime, full of heinous deeds flowing from a father's love—paradox of crime. Did morbid, jealous hate first slake its thirst in Abel's blood or not? Whether it did or not, the record givs us all we need to prove the crowning crime of man's creation, if created but to be filled with passions far more base than those of brutes, who behold with sight offended the genus which should be nobler, man, to whom all other lesser brutes must passivly yield their harmless lives as food, nerve the arm and steel the heart to do a baser crime than theirs to satisfy his selfish greed and lust.

The horrible, cruel butcheries, running from the earlier history of man up to the sixteenth century, and perpetrated in the name of religion and at the command of God, still are sought to be reënacted by the pulpit.

There can be no doubt that Joshua, David, Saul, Jehosephat, and all the other captains under God actually put to the sword and otherwise destroyed millions of innocent lives, chiefly women and children, and pillaged and burnt their cities. There are many to-day who stupidly believe that all this was done by the command of God to accomplish a moral purpose. While believing this, they also believe that this God was infinit in power, wisdom, mercy, and love. But they never ask themselvs why God did not choose some other way to improve the morals and advance the civilization of that age. Why not hav instructed Joshua to go over against the peoples of the one and thirty kings with the Pentateuch and gospel hymns of that day and hold a series of protracted meetings, and at these gatherings hav "poured out his spirit" in answer to the prayers Joshua could hav made, and thus hav had these sinful people convicted, converted, and saved to the glory of God?

In an article in an earlier number I undertook to show that ethical principles are eternal, and outside of any person, either a personal God or other; which proposition has run the gauntlet of criticism without challenge, wherefore I must be right in my premises. If a personal God existed, it would be no more right for him to do wrong than if the modalic principle of right were violated by some degraded specimen of humanity. Nor would Joshua's, David's, or Samuel's butcheries be tolerated by orthodox people of to-day, if they had occurred yesterday, last week, or last year, or if their kith and kin were among the slaughtered. If they were Philistines, Moabites, or other strangers, and a thousand or two thousand years ago, the moral sense of the orthodox Christian is not offended. It is not the brains of their children that Saul dashes against the wall, or their mother, yet pregnant, with their unborn sister, who is delivered in the throes of death by the sword of Joshua. Their ears do not hear the wail of anguish of the mother, nor do their eyes behold the fierce struggle of the father and brother as they make battle for life, nor do they hear the prayer for mercy at the capitulation, as the blood-stained executioner, at the command of a merciful father and God, with chariot and horse in hot pursuit runs down the fainting mother like hunted wolves, until, escape cut off, she yields her breast to the cruel spear thrust by a demon hand at the child for whom she seeks a point of safety. To narrow-minded bigots the matter of a few years, that with their God is as "but a day," is the panacea for crime, however heinous, and they sit, day after day, and listen to the repetition of the assurance that the "love of God overcometh the world," and that "his promises are yea and amen to all people." This about his promises may in a sense be true, since he has never been known to hav made any of himself, they all being made by proxy. The latest exposition of divine weakness or inability to keep promises is in the signal failure of the rainbow covenant, by violating which he recently compassed the destruction of some fifteen thousand lives, and devastated the Conemaugh valley in Pennsylvania, whereby a large number of the once faithful hav discovered that he does not "hold the waters in his hand" as chronicled in the superstitious legend. We shall soon need another vote on inspiration and the selection of a new canon by the priestcraft, and should any but those of predestinated Presbyterian faith attempt to vote, there should be a fight, and such a fight as once occurred in a main in Philadelphia, where two ill-tempered brutes, goaded on by their more brutal seconds, fought till there was nothing left but an inch and a half of tail.

The theological institutions of the present day are of loose faith and the students in the main hav a decided taste for that Liberal literature which in former years was of exceedingly clandestin presence. There is much complaint among the faculty that Infidelity and want of firmness in the faith are increasing among the young men, and unless there can be got some new evidence, theory, or science which will more clearly reveal the supernatural, faith in such a being will soon wholly disappear, and the once temples of the living God become homes for the owls and bats. ECCEART.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Three Riders

Three riders set out for the temple of fame;
Each booted and spurred and equipped the same.
The first rode forth at a rattling pace,
Like a jockey who wins an exciting race.
The second set out with caution slow,
So that, when need was, he might faster go.
The third rode steadily, quietly on,
At a quick jog-trot he could reckon upon.

And which do you think will the winner be:
The hare, the tortoise, or number three?

The first one soon broke down, of course,
He saved the saddle, but lost his horse;
The second met the regular fate,
Dallied too long, and was just too late.
The third, I grieve and regret to say,
Did not get there, for he lost his way.
He thought so much of his regular trot,
That to look at the signs he quite forgot.

See how strangely things befall.
Another, not thinking of fame at all,
Who was on his way to the breadfruit tree,
To provide for his wife and children three,
Went straightway into the temple of fame,
And innocently asked its name.
They answered him. With a quizzical face,
He remarked: "It's a most uncomfortable place."
Then he went on to the breadfruit tree,
And home to his wife and children three.

The moral? Well, if you can find it,
Write it out, for I shan't mind it.

Jessie's Story.

It was one afternoon in August when my brother Eddie and I set out to go huckleberrying. Nothing to do but my little brother George must go, too, and there was no peace till he got his little pint cup and started on ahead. George was about three and a half years old, Eddie was eleven, and I in my ninth year. It was one of those hot days when the grass turns red in the sun and fat black ants seem frantic with rage when you happen to get in their way. The bushes glistened with shining black berries, and lazy, round-ribbed, short-legged worms slept on the green leaves in the sunshine. The slugs and snails seemed lazier than ever, and even the Daddy Long Legs appeared to be snuggled up for a quiet snooze. The spiders were very still in their thread-like houses, and the beetles had no disposition to stir from their quarters. The "devil's darning-needles," however, were activ, and their gauzy wings circled around our heads, their owners apparently quite willing to sew up our mouths if they could only get the chance to perform so strange an operation. The crickets were hidden under the mosses and leaves, and once in a while announced their presence by a sharp chirp. The musketo family were pretty lively, and every now and then took a good sip of our good blood.

We said little, but diligently picked the berries that were clustered about us. Eddie filled his two-quart kettle first, and then tucked it away under a barberry bush, and hastened back to help fill my kettle.

Eddie is a good boy.

Well, very soon my measure was full of berries, excepting some green twigs and an occasional sour bug, and George had his little pint cup full, too, which was doing well for so small a boy. Our faces were red with the heat and musketo bites, and the perspiration dripped from us. My clothes were wet to my back, and we all felt nervous and uncomfortable, so we thought the best thing to do was to trudge along homeward.

When we went to get Eddie's berries under the barberry bush, lo and behold! the tin kettle was empty, and Billy West was just walking away with his two pails full to running over with big black huckleberries.

"You've been stealing my berries," said Eddie, in a white heat of indignation.

"No, I ain't, neither," and Billy West walked off in another direction.

"Giv me my berries, you thief," screamed Eddie, much exasperated.

"I havn't got your berries," said Billy West, "come now," and marching up to Eddie he struck him square in his face. This was too much, and Eddie returned the blow with interest. Of course we had heard all about the doctrin of turning the other cheek to be hit when you were smitten on one side, and also of giving your top coat when your inside coat was stolen from you. But Eddie was too much of a Yankee to turn the left cheek, or to giv all the berries we had left to the robber. Instead of that he pitched into Billy West like all possessed, but he was not so strong as Billy, and when I saw he was getting the worst of it I just walked up and took his part. I remember I had on a brand new hat—a big shade hat—that I had never worn before. Billy West went for that hat, and in less than two minutes such a looking hat you never saw before. He scratched me and I scratched him. Georgie, poor little boy, seeing I was going to be beaten, toddled up and, doubling his little fist, hit Billy a blow that made him wink. There then ensued a regular pitched battle, and we should hav come off conquerors had not Billy watched his chance, snatched his kettle of berries, and run for home.

Such looking children as we were when we reached our home you never saw. Faces scratched and bleeding, clothing torn, and eyes flashing fire. My new hat was a sight, with its rim broken and hanging from its mashed crown. With quivering lips we related our story to our sympathetic parents, and, after all, there is nobody has such genuin sympathy for us as our father and mother—nobody can love us so well and so truly; nobody can take our part so sincerely. Our appearance on this occasion spoke louder than words. My father immediately put on his hat and walked out of doors. It was not long before Billy West was suffering for the insults and injuries he had heaped upon us. The screams rent the neighborhood, but I will venture to say he will never again steal berries from children who hav earned them by the sweat of their brows, nor will he fight in an unrighteous cause. My father had scarcely returned before Billy West's mother was at the door, and the vile epithets that scampered from off her tongue plainly showed from whom Billy had inherited his evil nature.

Perhaps you think this story is not true, but it is the plain, unvarnished truth. I do not approve of fighting as a general rule, but I do believe in all defending their honest and undoubted rights. I hav never been sorry for the battle of that sultry afternoon, but hav always regretted that our united strength was insufficient to cope with the big, blustering, muscular sneak-thief Billy West. Jessie.

The Ocean's Depths.

The greatest known depth of the ocean is midway between the island of Tristan d'Acunha and the mouth of the Rio de la Plata. The bottom was there reached at a depth of 40,236 feet, or eight and three-fourths miles, exceeding by more than 17,000 feet the hight of Mount Everest, the loftiest mountain in the world. In north Atlantic ocean, south of Newfoundland, soundings hav been made to the depth of 4,580 fathoms, or 27,480 feet, while depths equaling 34,000 feet, or six and one-half miles, are reported south of the Bermuda islands. The average depth of the Pacific ocean between Japan and California is a little over 2,000 fathoms; between Chili and the Sandwich islands 2,500 fathoms, and Chili and New Zealand 1,500 fathoms. The average depths of all the oceans is from 2,000 to 2,500 fathoms.

Why It Is Cold on the Mountains.

Go into a greenhouse on a sunshiny day, and we find the temperature much hotter there than outside. The glass will allow the hot sunbeams to enter, but it refuses to allow them out again with equal freedom, and consequently the temperature rises. Our whole earth is in this way to be likened to a greenhouse, only, instead of the panes of glass, we are enveloped by an enormous coating of atmosphere. When we are on the earth's surface we are, as it were, inside the greenhouse, and we benefit by the interposition of the atmosphere; but when we begin to climb very high mountains we gradually get through the atmosphere, and then we suffer from the cold. If we could imagin the earth stripped of its coat of air, then eternal frost would reign over the whole earth as well as on the top of the mountains.

Playing the Wrong Tune.

To do the right thing in the right place is a faculty few people possess. A steamboat-load of excursionists was thrown into a panic by a singular cause the other day. The boat stopped suddenly on account of some defect in the machinery, and the band struck up, with misguided taste, a very sweet but doleful tune in slow time. The people took this as an omen that their last hour had come, and there was a great uproar, and everybody began looking for life-preservers. But the captain was a man of tact, and as the band would not stop, he turned on the whistle and drowned the music, whereat everybody laughed, and presently the boat went on.

Verbal Snares.

The popularity of Peter Piper's celebrated peck of pickled peppers will probably never wane as a snare to catch the tongue that would fain be agil; but that test has formidable rivals. The following short sentences, as their authors maintain, do wonders in baffling the ordinary powers of speech:

Gaze on the gay gray brigade.

The sea ceaseth, and it sufficeth us.

Say, should such a shapely sash shabby stitches show?

Strange strategic statistics.

Giv Grimes Jim's gilt gig-whip.

Sarah in a shawl shoveled soft snow softly.

She sells sea shells.

A cup of coffee in a copper coffee-pot.

Smith's spirit-flask split Philip's sixth sister's fifth squirrel's skull.

Dogs' Memory.

The Zoophilist, an English paper devoted to the protection of animals from cruelty, tells some stories which are apparently well authenticated, illustrating the keenness of the sense of recognition in dogs. The late Mr. Eyre, a clergyman, left a dog which was very much attached to him at the country house of a friend, while he left England for a long sojourn abroad. After two years Mr. Eyre returned, arriving at his friend's house late at night, and retiring without having the dog called.

Next morning Mr. Eyre was awakened by the dog bursting into his bedroom, and leaping upon him with the wildest demonstrations of delight.

"How on earth did he know I had arrived?" asked the gentleman of the servant who brought hot water.

"O sir," the man replied, "it is the most curious thing! As I was cleaning your boots the dog recognized them, and became excited beyond measure, and I hav not been able to quiet him till he saw where I was carrying them, and rushed up along with me to your door."

A correspondent of the same English paper relates that he gave away, at a year old, a dog which he was unable to keep in his London home. After eight years the dog was returned to its first owner.

"The dog met me," said the correspondent, 'at first as a stranger, and then, with little animated sniffs of inquiry, going round and round me. I remained still for a few moments while she grew more and more excited. At last I stooped and patted her, and called her by her name, 'Dee.'

"On hearing my voice the poor beast gave what I can only describe as a scream of rapture, and leaped into my arms. From that moment she attached herself to me as if she had never left me, and with the tenderest devotion."

What the Little Ones Are Saying.

The little girl who wrote on her examination paper, "The interior of Africa is principally used for purposes of exploration," was wiser than she thought.

Teacher: "Can you tell me why lightning never strikes twice in the same place?" Boy: "Yes, sir. Because there's nothing left of the place after the first strike."

"I've never seen my hands when they were as dirty as yours," said a mother to her young daughter by way of reproving her for want of neatness. "No," quickly retorted the clever child, "but I guess grandma has."

Edith's aunt said she might get four caramels from a plate in the closet. I am very sorry to say she took five; but she wasn't quite happy while eating them. She was very still for some time, and then asked: "Aunty, does God know how many caramels I took?" "Yes, Edith." After another long silence she broke out: "Well, I shouldn't think he'd make such a fuss about one caramel!"

"Now, Gus," said a boy to his playmate, "we've got this dog in partnership, and half belongs to each of us. We'll call one end mine, and one end yours, and you can hav just which end you like." "All right," replied Gus, "you can hav the front end [persuasivly] with the eyes, and the ears, and the mouth, and the collar, and teeth, or the rear end with just the tail." "I'll take the front end." "All right; you'll hav to feed him, then."

Grandma had taught our "two-year-old" to answer a great many Bible questions, and was fond of "showing him off." On one of these occasions she asked him, "Who was put in the lion's den?" "Daniel," was the prompt answer. "Did the lions eat Daniel?" "No." "Why?" The answer should hav been, "Because God shut their mouths," but the little fellow reflected a minute, and then said: "I dess Daniel wasn't dood to eat."

Correspondence.

Warrensburg, Ill., June 10, 1889.

Dear Miss Wixon: As I hav nothing to do, I will occupy the time in writing to the Children's Corner. My pa does not take The Truth Seeker. We had never heard of such a paper till a few weeks ago Mr. I. C. Odle and wife moved to the Burg. They are stanch Freethinkers. They most heartily lend us their paper. My pa has fallen in love with the paper, and I admire the Children's Corner very much. As this is my first letter, I hope it will find a place in the Corner. I am twelve years old. Your Freethinker friend, Julia A. Markland.

Wheeling, W. Va., July 9, 1889.

Dear Miss Wixon: Pa wants me to write a little letter for The Truth Seeker. I never wrote any for a paper before. I am eleven next week. I hav two sisters—Della is fourteen, and Ina is six. We do not go to school; pa teaches us at home. He does not want us to go to school where they read the Bible and pray. We don't go to church or Sunday-school.

I sell papers and make from $2 to $3 a week. If the Christians keep on with this Sunday business I shall hav to quit selling papers on Sunday. I am a Liberal. I expect to liv and die one. I hope all the little folks who write for The Truth Seeker will be good Liberals when they grow up.

I guess I will close for this time.

Orlo Ingersoll Noe.

Wheeling, W. Va., July 9, 1889.

Dear Miss Wixon: I hav never written a letter for The Truth Seeker. I will try and write a small letter now. I hav a brother eleven years old, and a sister six years old, and I am fourteen. I read The Truth Seeker every week. I like to read the Children's Corner very much. I do not go to church or Sunday-school. I don't believe in the doctrin they teach. Pa is going to take The Truth Seeker as soon as he can. I liv on the banks of the Ohio river, and can see the steamboats glide along, which is a grand sight. I am sure there are many children living back from rivers who would be glad to see a steamboat. Now, Miss Wixon, I am only a little girl, and this is a little letter, and I hope it will find a little corner in the paper, so the little folks can get acquainted with me.

THE STRUGGLE
FOR
Religious and Political Liberty.
In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

Poetry.

The Progress of Man.

From the Boston Transcript.

Hard was the lot of our fathers, the men of the early world,
Beast-like, scratching the earth for a niggardly dole of her fruit.
Wedged in the clefts of the hills, in the hollows of tree-trunks curled.
Groping in glooms of the cave, starving on berry and root.

Shelterless, weaponless, weak, a haggard and wandering brood,
Seared by the brand of the sun, by the whirlwind scattered and tossed.
Buried in drifts of the snow, whelmed by the rivers in flood.
Flayed by the scourge of the storm, scarred by the dagger of frost.

A wretched and barbarous race, unskilled, at the mercy of all,
In haste to escape from its foes to the hiding-place of the dead;
Hunted of hunger and lean, whose life was a piteous crawl
From the dark of the womb to the dark of the grave through the shadow of dread!

But we! we are cunning and strong, we hav made all wisdom our own;
We hav mastered all arts, we hav tools and raiment and roof overhead,
We laugh at the shriek of the winds, we dance on the brute overthrown,
With his skin we hav clothed us about, with his flesh we hav filled us and fed.

Our fathers, the cowering men of the caves, were the cave bear's prey;
They fled him, we seek him: the snows with his blood, not ours, shall be dyed:
We follow his tracks through the drift, ha! ha! we spear him and slay;
We feast on the fat of his ribs; we comfort our loins with his hide.

Oh, marvelous progress of man! oh, race of unspeakable craft!
Oh, strikers of fire from the heart of the rock in a fortunate hour!
Who hav fitted the sharpened flint to the wonderful pine wood haft:
In the day of your weakness and want, who dreamed of the day of your power?

—H. D. Traill.

Literary Notices.

COL. J. R. KELSO AND HIS BOOKS.

Reader, some one once said: "Beware when God sends a thinker onto this planet." God, or good—Evolution—has sent Col. John R. Kelso, one of the deepest, highest, broadest thinkers, to teach the false guides and misleaders of a blind and ignorant world to beware of the coming light of a true cosmogony, which shall dissipate Godism, popery, and priestcraft as the approaching morning sun drives ghosts home to churchyards. His brain is a fountain of facts and truths, which he has the superior power to connect and weave into a chain and web of logic and philosophy, and analyze, discriminating between the false and the true. He is, to my mind, an approximation to a master world-builder. His "Universe Analyzed" is a "feast of fat things" to a scientific humanitarian. In the light and truth of the grand cosmogony he unfolds and pictures, how pueril, absurd, and inhuman is the God-and-creation assumption—this insignificant earth and all its man-made systems and selfish schemes a mere speck on the map of the universe. I would that space would permit me to review it in detail.

His book, "Spiritualism Sustained," does sustain Spiritualism from orthodox authority, if not from scientific, and completely demol. ishes orthodox absurdities with a master's logic.

His "Bible Analyzed" is an extensiv, learned, masterly display of facts, figures, critical acumen, and logic to expose and show up the assumption, absurdities, sophistry, falsehood, and inhumanity of popes, priests, kings, despots, and endeavorers to make the Bible an infallible authority, guide, and savior to a blind, ignorant, credulous world. Reader, however wise you are, buy and read Colonel Kelso's books, and thereby be richer and wiser. PROF. J. H. COOK.

RESEARCHES IN JEWISH HISTORY. Including the rise and development of Zoroastrianism, and the derivation of Christianity; to which are added several papers on kindred subjects, among which is "Whence Our Aryan Ancestors?" By G. W. Brown, M.D. Rockford, Ill.

This is a book that we commend to our readers. It exhibits learning and keen critical reasoning. The Christian belief is clearly proved to hav no historical foundation. Persons who hav read this book will never be at a loss in arguments with Christians. We will fill orders for the work at $1.50. We append a letter from Miss Gibson:

I am so well pleased with Dr. Brown's book, just received, that I cannot forbear saying a few words in its favor.

As its name indicates, it consists of "Researches in Oriental History," embracing: 1. Researches in Jewish History; 2. In Zoroastrianism; 3. Derivation of Christianity; 4. Whence Came the Aryans?

Its author believes this is the only successful attempt to trace the messianic idea from its fountain, and follow it until developed into Christianity.

As I am very anxious that this book should be read by all of our Liberal thinkers, as well as by Christians, I will refrain from expressing my opinion, leaving it to each reader to judge whether the author has succeeded or not. It is certain that a large amount of Christian authority has been consulted and adduced, and if the author has arrived at false conclusions, based on Christian evidence, the fault is more theirs than his. He shows by their own investigations that there are no monumental traces of the Jews ever having been in Egypt, that they were not a nation previous to the captivity, only 445 years B.C., and that the Christian religion was derived from pagan myths several thousand years old. The book is worthy of an attentiv and general perusal. It contains much valuable matter gleaned from high authentic sources, and is justly entitled, "Researches."

The whole work, with table of contents, makes 407 12mo pages. It is printed from new long primer type on fine double calendered white paper, and strongly bound in muslin. ELLA E. GIBSON.

Barre, Mass., April 17, 1889.

MEDIUMSHIP: A Course of Seven Lectures, delivered at the Mount Pleasant Park Camp-meeting, during the month of August, 1888. Also, a lecture on the Perpetuity of Spiritualism, given at the same place, on the last Sunday of the camp-meeting. By Prof. J. S. Loveland. Chicago, Ill.: Moses Hull & Co. Price, $1.50.

This work is well written, printed, and bound. Those wishing to investigate possibilities of continued existence will welcome it.

The United States Cremation Company forwards us a pamphlet containing favorable "Opinions on Cremation" by distinguished men.

"On Faith," by Robert Park, M.D., is a good dissection of the ludicrous thing known as faith. The book is published by Watts & Co., London, at 10 cents.

"The Universal Republic. Advocating the Unity of Nations." An Occasional Magazine. This publication is edited by Geo. J. Holyoake, and brought out by the Coöperativ Printing Society, London. It has the excellent aim of doing away with the absurdity of national hatreds and establishing universal peace and good will.

Whoever is interested in the controversy over vaccination may send to Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., for a pamphlet entitled, "Dr. Cyrus Edson's Plea for Compulsory Vaccination reviewed by E. B. Foote, Jr, M.D." We are incompetent to pronounce on the matter, but may say that we hav never seen the arguments on the anti-vaccination side more cogently presented.

Prof. H. M. Cottinger some time ago wrote a book called, "Rosa, the Educating Mother. Written for Mothers and Young Ladies of Age." Its object is to supply a manual for mothers who wish to train their children up in principles of Freethought and common sense. The second edition of the work is now out, enlarged, and illustrated with a number of engravings. Price, $1.25.

We hav words of praise for the "Address in Memory of Thomas Paine" delivered by Florence Kelley Wischnemetzky before the Friendship Liberal League of Philadelphia, and now printed in book form. The author thinks that were Thomas Paine here now his voice would be heard in tremendous tones demanding reform of present evils political and economic. She thinks that those who now wish to emulate him should do so by assailing those evils as fearlessly and devotedly as would he. Price, 5 cents; published by the Truth Publishing Co., Pittsburgh, Pa.

Colby & Rich, Boston, hav published a work essaying to demolish the Seybert commission report adverse to Spiritualism. It is by A. B. Richmond, Esq., a member of the Pennsylvania bar, and the author displays the clearness of speech and acuteness of argument of his profession. The title is, "Addendum to a Review in 1887 of the Seybert Commissioners' Report." The book is well bound in cloth, with a handsomely engraved frontispiece representing the grounds of the Cassadaga Lake Free Spiritualist Association in 1888. The pages number 164; the price is only 75 cents. This book, like any other named in these reviews, may be had of the Truth Seeker Company.

Friends and admirers of the late William Denton may wish to get a work just written by his son, Sherman Denton, artist to the United States Fish Commission, Washington, D. C. It is entitled, "Incidents of a Collector's Rambles in Australia, New Zealand, and New Guinea." With illustrations by the author. The book is got out by a skilful firm of printers and publishers, Lee & Shepard, Boston, and has excellent workmanship. The illustrations, of the scenery, nativs, and animals of the strange lands visited, are exceedingly entertaining, and the reading-matter is as good. Price, $2.

Charles Watts has written, and published at 10 cents, a 24-page pamphlet, "The Glory of Unbelief." It is an excellent thing. Of the soundness of its logic and plainness of its style, readers may get their ideas from these passages:

There is but one state of mind in which it may be said unbelief can hav but little or no place, and that is in a condition of total ignorance. Perfect knowledge would, of course, remove all unbelief of truth; but even with it there would be unbelief as regards error. But, as this condition is unattainable, it need not be discussed. Total ignorance does not disbelieve, because there is, in that case, nothing present to the mind in reference to which unbelief can be exercised. This will go a long way to explain the fact that, in times of supreme ignorance, unbelief was comparativly unknown. Priestcraft held its sway, mental stagnation obtained, and men and women were blind believers in, and followers of, the then prevailing errors. But the moment progress, from the condition of ignorance, commenced, new forms of thought became present to the mind, new opinions were perceived, new theories sprang up, investigation took place, and unbelief became a necessary consequent. And this unbelief will be sure to increase with increasing knowledge. In childhood the first impressions we receive we naturally enough imagin to be indisputably correct, whether in religion, in philosophy, or in the ordinary commonplace affairs of life.

Freethought teaches the great fundamental truth, namely, that man has an absolute right to think freely, unfettered by tradition and uncontroled by creeds and dogmas. This is the essence of all true thinking; for no one can think successfully in shackles, and truth can never be properly reached while thought is in chains. Protestantism boasts that it not only allows the right of private judgment, but that such right is its cardinal principle and watchword. Now, true private judgment means the right to arrive at any opinion which can be legitimately reached by the laws of thought and the canons of logic, or the term is a misleading misnomer. It was the violation of this principle that made the conduct of the Protestant reformers so thoroughly inconsistent. They robbed private judgment of its real essence by compelling its conclusions to harmonize with their own, and thus limiting that freedom which is absolutely necessary to private judgment. The Rev. George Armstrong once said of the church of England, and the same statement is equally applicable to some other Protestant sects: "I am allowed the right of private judgment on condition that I arrive at the opinions settled beforehand for me by the church." And he remarks: "If I deny the right of private judgment, the church calls me a Romanist; if I acknowledge it and act upon it, she brands me as a heretic." Such inconsistency as this is foreign to the genius of Freethought. Unless a person's right to think at all is denied, he must be permitted the full right to arrive at any conclusion which may seem to him rational. Every man has a right to his views, even though he stand alone in their advocacy. Infallibility alone can possess the right to suppress any opinion, because only infallibility can declare for certain that an opinion is necessarily an error; and as, of course, infallibility does not exist, such right is not to be found.

Lecky, in his "History of European Morals," tells us that "nearly all the greatest intellectual achievements of the past three centuries hav been preceded and prepared by the growth of Skepticism. . . . The splendid discoveries of physical science would hav been impossible but for the scientific skepticisms of the school of Bacon. . . . Not till the education of Europe passed from the monasteries to the universities; not till Mohammedan science and classical Freethought and industrial independence broke the scepter of the church, did the intellectual revival of Europe begin." Thus the lesson of all history is that unbelief in the old has has ever preceded the introduction of the new. Christianity itself came based upon the disbelief in paganism, and the pagans, feeling outraged at the proposed change, called the first Christians not only unbelievers, but even Atheists. Martin Luther disbelieved in the mysteries and mummeries of Roman Catholicism, and the result was what is called the Protestant Reformation. Copernicus and Galileo disbelieved in the Bible cosmogony, with its theory of the heavens; and this skepticism gave birth to correct views upon the great science of astronomy. Modern geologists reject the Bible story of creation, and the consequence is more faith in nature's records than in the absurdities of the Christian Bible.

Lucretius, Spinoza, Goethe, Humboldt, Dr. Priestley, Newton, Voltaire, Paine, Robert Owen, Lyell, Darwin, Tyndall, Huxley, and Harriet Martineau are prominent in the pantheon of the world's benefactors; and these were all unbelievers from the orthodox standpoint. In France nearly all the scientific men are heretics; and Germany—the most philosophic land of modern days—is notoriously skeptical.

Unbelief is, of course, negativ on the one side; but there is always another aspect of it to be seen, if one will only take the trouble to look fairly for it. Unbelief in one thing means belief in the opposit, and it is quite possible that such opposit may be the more worthy of the two.

A half dozen different bodies may each be claiming the same allegiance, and, as their views will probably be conflicting and irreconcilable, to believe the pretensions of the one would be to disbelieve the claims of the others. But if a person disbelieves he also believes; his disbelief is the negativ side of his faith, and his belief is the positiv side.

Disbelief in an error, or in that which is held to be an error, by any man, involves belief in the opposit of the error, which is truth, or at all events that which is recognized as such by him who receives it. To describe a man as an unbeliever without having regard to what it is that he disbelieves, and consequently what he believes as the opposit of his unbelief, is not fair to him, and is equally unfair to those who from this description learn to estimate his views. Unbelief and belief must run hand in hand, and cannot be separated. The most devout believer is equally an unbeliever with him whom the world calls "Infidel," and stigmatizes with reproachful terms and epithets in consequence of his skepticism. They differ, of course, as to the sphere of their faith and doubt; but the one has no more right to be called a believer par excellence than has the other. Just as Luther disbelieved in Romanism and sought to destroy it, in order to make way for Protestantism, so Secularists to-day disbelieve in the errors of the church, and are thereby inspired to work for the establishment of greater and grander truths than theology ever recognized or the church ever possessed. The old church called Luther an unbeliever, and it was right so far; but a large portion of society came to recognize him as a true believer. His positiv work was the outcome of his unbelief, and but for that it could hav had no existence. Christianity owes its existence to unbelief. If Christ and St. Paul had not rejected many of the teachings of paganism and Judaism the religious change which it is alleged occurred two thousand years ago would in all probability never hav taken place. Thus unbelief has ever been the precursor of a newer and truer faith; it is the herald of progress, the forerunner of improvement, and the harbinger of coming good.

Unbelievers are supposed to hav no right to the term sacred, whereas it belongs to them in a much higher sense than it does to the church. What is truly sacred? The beautiful in art, the true in philosophy, the noble and pure in human conduct—these are all sacred, because they are in harmony with the higher instincts of man, and tend to elevate and regenerate the race. True sacredness does not consist in supernatural power, priestly arrogance, or assumption of authority to our fellow-man. Where mind speaks to mind, either orally or in writing, and thus impresses for good; where intellect diffuses its choicest blessings abroad among mankind; where learning and thought rise into higher regions of light and truth; where poetry illumins and art charms; where liberty goes forth breaking asunder the chains of the captiv; where knowledge dwells and love manifests its power; where virtue reigns supreme and justice bears the sway—there, and there alone, is true sanctification to be found, encircled in the temple of reality and enthroned upon the pinnacle of humanity.

When a man dogmatically asserts that he has found all the truth which is capable to be found, and that his system contains perfect verity without any mixture of error, his views become stereotyped, and it is quite impossible that any change can take place in his opinions. His mind is not open to receive new light from any source whatever, and thought with him is a useless and vain operation and investigation the quintessence of folly. For him to receive any new truth would be to admit that what he possessed before was in some way defectiv and imperfect, and that his creed protests against with the authority of an infallible mandate. His position is necessarily stationary; he stands just where his grandsires stood ages past, and where he would wish his descendants to remain for ages to come. Now, surely unbelief is far in advance of such a condition as this, for it leaves its possessor, without bias and prejudice, waiting the new knowledge that is continually to be had for the seeking. It allows his mind full scope to grow and advance in wisdom, because he does not for one moment believe that he has reached a perfection beyond which it is impossible to proceed.

The principal argument against unbelief is based upon the supposition that we hav an infallible guide, whereas the fact is that we neither hav nor can hav anything of the kind.

ANTI PROHIBITION.

PRICE, 20 CENTS.

The number of heads under which you hav divided the subject matter of the pamphlet, and the concise manner in which each point is discussed, should be highly commended. Therefore I take great pleasure in recommending "Anti-Prohibition" to the consideration of every person who is interested, not only in the cause of temperance, but in the principles of self-government.—J. J. McCabe.

Gems of Thought.

SCIENCE ascribes to natural causes what theology ascribes to supernatural ones.—Buckle's History of Civilization.

THEOLOGY is not what we know about God, but what we do not know about nature.—Ingersoll.

AN examination, however slight, of the principles upon which this pretended science, theology, is founded, forces us to acknowledge that these principles, formerly judged incontestable, are only hazardous suppositions, imagined by ignorance, propagated by enthusiasm or knavery, adopted by timid credulity, preserved by unreasoning custom, and revered solely because not understood.—D'Holbach.

WHEN a man talks to us about Jesus in the language of the churches—about the atonement, original sin, sanctification, saving grace, etc.—he simply uses a jargon that may mean something to him, but can mean nothing at all to an outsider. He states as facts things which hav no ground either in reason or experience; they belong to a world apart, which neither the rest of our knowledge nor our natural faculties of reason and observation can put us in communication with.—John Burroughs.

WHEN our theologians say that "Christ suffered for our sins, and that, because he suffered, our sins are forgiven," they make a statement that cannot be rationally conceived; they use a language not comprehensible by common sense—the language of mysticism.—Popular Science Monthly.

THE doctrin of the atonement is absurd, unjust, and immoral.—Ingersoll.

WE learn to know only that which we love.—Goethe.

No profit grows where there's no pleasure ta'en.—Shakspere.

THE science of medicin has had but one enemy—religion.—Ingersoll.

IT cannot be doubted that the progress of the sanativ art, that the use of more wholesome food and more comfortable habitations, that a mode of life which shall develop the physical powers by exercise, without at the same time impairing them by excess; in fine, that the destruction of the two most activ causes of deterioration, penury and wretchedness on the one hand, and enormous wealth on the other, must necessarily tend to prolong the common duration of man's existence, and secure him a more constant health and a more robust constitution. It is manifest that the improvement of the practice of medicin, become more efficacious in consequence of the progress of reason and the social order, must in the end put a period to transmissible or contagious disorders, as well as those general maladies resulting from climate, ailments, and the nature of certain occupations. Nor would it be difficult to prove that this hope might be extended to almost every other malady, of which it is probable we shall hereafter discover the most remote causes. Would it even be absurd to suppose this quality of melioration in the human species as susceptible of an indefinit advancement; to suppose that a period must one day arrive when death will be nothing more than the effect either of extraordinary accidents or of the slow and gradual decay of the vital powers; and that the duration of the middle space, of the interval between the birth of man and this decay, will itself hav no assignable limit?—Condorcet.

EVENTS, like the pendulum of a clock, hav swung forward and backward, but after all, man, like the hands, has gone steadily on. Man is growing grander.—Ingersoll.

I HAV long since ceased to ask the world's leave to say what I think, and what I believe to be useful to the public.—Robert Dale Owen.

OPINIONS which are equally honest on both sides should not affect personal esteem or social intercourse.—Jefferson.

IT is forbidden in the gospel to call one's brother raca (a fool); nevertheless, the clergy advise us so to call him if he be not of our opinion, if we hav an opinion, or of the opinion of the clergy, if we hav none of our own.—Voltaire.

To doubt is to think, and to think is to improve.—Dr. Brewer.

SUPPOSE the church had had absolute control of the human mind at any time, would not the words liberty and progress hav been blotted from human speech? In defiance of advice, the world has advanced.—Ingersoll.

WE recognize no revelation other than that manifested in the great book of nature, open alike to all men to study and read, and to which we must therefore look for facts.—Marquis of Queensberry.

As to the theology that is now studied in the place of the works of God, it is the study of human opinions and of human fancies concerning God. It is not the study of God himself in the works that he has made, but in the works or writings that man has made.—Paine.

THE whole course of modern civilization tends to establish the proposition that the people is the source of all authority; and society, to use the words of Abraham Lincoln, is seeking to solve the problem how the government of the people by the people for the benefit of the people may be made most thorough and most efficient. The church of England still attributes to the sovereign a direct divine authority without intervention by the people, and maintains, with a laudable disregard of ethics, that the hearts of kings are in all cases disposed and turned as seems best to the divine wisdom.—Westminster Review.

OUR country is founded upon the dignity of labor—upon the equality of man. Ours is the first real republic in the history of the world. Beneath our flag the people are free. We hav retired the gods from politics. We hav found that man is the only source of political power, and that the governed should govern. We hav disfranchised the aristocrats of the air and hav given one country to mankind.—Ingersoll.

NOT SO UNCERTAIN.—In the Catholic cathedral Rev. Father McNeece took occasion in his sermon, which had reference to the catastrophe, to make some impressiv observations on the uncertainty of death.—Dublin Freeman's Journal.

LAWYER: "From your story I am convinced that you are innocent. Now, hav you any wealthy friends?" Prisoner: "No." "Belong to any secret society?" "No." "Church?" "No." "Political club?" "No." 'God help you!"—Puck.

BLINKS: "Do you believe in a state of future damnation, Deacon Grimm?" Deacon Grimm: "Of course I do. How would I ever get even with the people I hav forgiven at various times if there were no such thing as future punishment?"—Terre Haute Express.

A LITTLE boy complained that his sister had purposely pushed him, which she denied. Her father, taking her aside, said: "Now, Abbie, don't you go to Sunday-school, and don't they teach you that it is wrong to tell lies?" "We havn't got so far as that," she interrupted.—Woman's Work.

IRISH NAMES IN THE BIBLE.—A correspondent of the New York Sun says: "The family of Mac Cabes are not the only Irish folks mentioned in the Bible. Orion is also spoken of in the Bible, and what is more, he was a good Irishman, for we know he is in heaven, having seen him there on many a fine starlight night."

DEACON SKINFLINT: "This is an age of irreverence. I read to-night about some fellow who had engraved the Lord's Prayer on a $10 gold piece and wears it on his watch-chain for a curiosity. This is all wrong, very wrong. There are some things too sacred to be trifled with." Carper: "To which do you refer, deacon, the prayer or the gold piece?"—Terre Haute Express.

THE recording secretary of the Missionary society generally manages to say what he has to say so that his language will not be misconstrued; but when, at a meeting of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society at East Orange, N. J., last week, he said that "thousands of gallons of rum go into Africa for every missionary who is sent there," one of the sisters of that society whispered to another: "Rather a large allowance of liquor for those missionaries."—Christian Advocate.

THE traveling missionary had had a somewhat varied experience. He had been through a rough country and his meek spirit had been sorely tried. He had found the spirit of irreverence and disbelief all over the land and the ground was stony. But he left in despair when he struck an old man at the railway station in Texas. They were both waiting for the train. He got into conversation with the grizzled veteran of frontier life. They discussed various things, and finally the missionary asked: "Are you prepared to die?" "I guess you've always got to be prepared in this country. Yes, I'm prepared to die or get the drop on the other fellow." "I don't mean that. Are you prepared for a hereafter?" "Why, certainly. A hereafter! Look here, stranger. I was brought up in Arkansaw, an' I went from there to Missouri, an' from there I came to Texas, an' I've lived here ten years. I guess I can stand any hereafter as may be."—San Francisco Chronicle.

"BELOVED flock," the parson said, then paused and wiped his eyes;
"As pastor and as people we must sever tender ties.
I've a call to go to Blanktown to be their chosen pastor;
A call so loud to disobey, I fear, would grieve the master."

Replied the spokesman of the flock: "Though loud the call may be,
We'll call you louder to remain; an X for every V
Those Blanktown people offer you we'll giv to keep you here.
We'll trust you'll hear a voice divine, our call's so loud and clear."

With sobbing voice the parson said: "My duty's clearer now:
I'll stay with you, beloved ones; to heaven's will I bow.
So let us sing, 'Blest Be the Tie,' and sing it clear and strong;
To leave you when you call so loud would be exceeding wrong."

Then in his study sat he down a letter to indite

THE CHRISTIANS' GOD NO HELP IN TIME OF NEED.

When your fear cometh as desolation, and your destruction as a whirlwind; when distress and anguish cometh upon you, then shall they call upon me but I will not answer.—Prov. i, 26, 27.

Notes and Clippings.

"He thinketh no evil," is the suitable inscription on Henry Ward Beecher's monument.

A Baptist church at Wolverhampton, Eng., in order to provide amusement and recreation for the parish, has built a billiard and smoking room back of its chapel, and a bar for the sale of non-intoxicants, everything to be under the control of the government of the church.

The other day Mary J. Wilcox was committed by Justice White in the Harlem, New York city, police court for examination as to her sanity. She stood at the corner of 125th street and Third avenue the preceding morning, and by waving a crucifix over her head and reading from a book attracted a crowd.

In a village in Somerset, Eng., the following superstitious belief is prevalent: During service in the church, if the church clock strikes while a hymn is being sung, the belief is that some parishioner will die within the week. So strong is this belief that the striking mechanism of the clock is always stopped during services in which hymns are sung.

When the practice of cremation was introduced here a few years ago, its advocates believed that it would soon supersede the custom of burial. But it has not grown in favor as they supposed it would grow. It is now evident that the popular feeling against the practice is of a kind that cannot be overcome in this generation. The crematory is looked upon as a pagan institution, not to be introduced into Christian countries.—Sun.

The American Israelite reports Prof. Felix Adler as advocating that steps be taken to provide for the education of the people in the political system of the country by free lectures. Adults should be educated in political duties just as children are taught in the free schools. To be able to read the Constitution of the United States is not enough. People should be taught a knowledge of the principles of our government and how to elect better and wiser rulers.

The well-to-do clergyman who recently expressed wonder why people will make their homes in places like Johnstown, and intimates that it serves them right when a torrent sweeps them away, is not unlike the French princess who could not understand why the starving poor persisted in crying for bread when there were delicious little tarts for sale at three sous apiece. A good, healthy dose of hard-worked poverty would do that preacher a world of good. It might even make a man of him.

Mark Twain says on the language of the Sandwich islands: "The nativ language is soft and liquid and flexible, and in every way efficient and satisfactory—till you get mad; then, there you are; there isn't anything in it to swear with. Good judges all say it is the best Sunday language there is; but then all the other six days in the week it just hangs idle on your hands; it isn't any good for business, and you can't work a telephone with it. Many a time the attention of the missionaries has been called to this defect, and they are always promising they are going to fix it; but no, they go fooling along and fooling along, and nothing is done."

Mgr. Thomas S. Preston said at New York that cremation is abhorrent to the practice and teaching of the Roman Catholic church; that it is an attack upon the doctrin of the resurrection, the church holding that the self-same body which is buried shall rise again; and that the funeral of a Catholic whose remains had been incinerated could not be attended with any of the rites of the church.

A well-known New England minister has refused the degree of D.D. from a famous American college, and declines to giv his reason for this unprecedented step. The truth is, in all probability, that the reckless and unreasonable distribution of college degrees has made such an honor so cheap that its rejection has become a matter of necessity to self-respecting men. It is hardly to be wondered at that the New Englander referred to exclaims in tones of disgust, "Fiddle D. D."—World.

An Italian fruit vender known as "Italy Joe" died a horrible death on the morning of July 15th, at Leadville, Col. Some time ago he placed in one of his rooms an image which he worshiped with much zeal. Three candles were kept constantly burning, day and night. Last night his body was found in the rear room, which was separated from the front room by a thin partition, lying beside a bed, which was pushed against the partition. He was lying on his back, his arms stretched above his head, and his fingers clenched, as though he had died in great agony. His head and face were burnt beyond recognition. It is supposed that one of the candles set fire to the thin partition, and the old man, having fallen asleep, was burnt to death.

Late anecdotes of the bar include the following description of Mr. Justice Maule's way of putting it: "Do you know what an oath is, my child?" "Yes, sir; I am obliged to tell the truth." "And if you always tell the truth, where will you go to when you die?" "Up to heaven, sir." "And what will become of you if you tell lies?" "I shall go down to the naughty place, sir." "Are you quite sure of that?" "Yes, sir; quite sure." "Let her be sworn. It's quite clear she knows a great deal more about it than I do." A witness once said to him: "My lord, you may believe me or not, but I hav told the truth, and I hav been wedded to truth from my infancy." "Yes, sir," said Maule, "but the question is, how long hav you been a widower?"

A curious survival of that ancient Sabbatarianism which has so generally passed away is mentioned by a Woodbury (Conn.) correspondent of the Waterbury American. In the old days, Saturday evening was held practically as sacred as Sunday in New England, and it would hav been as great an offense for a president to start on an outing Saturday evening as Sunday morning. It appears that there are places in the rural districts of Connecticut where this view of the evening is held by some of the people. A poet, who givs readings from his works—works which "would never harm a fly" on any day of the week—spent last Sunday in Woodbury, and the correspondent says: "There is great regret that we could not hear him read, but Saturday evening was the only one he could giv us, and there is still a sentiment here which keeps our better class at home on that night."

Agnosticism and Christianity.

From the Nineteenth Century.

Nemo ergo ex me scire quærat, quod me nescire scio, nisi forte ut nescire discat.*—Augustinus, De Civ. Dei, xii, 7.

Controversy, like most things in this world, has a good and a bad side. On the good side, it may be said, that it stimulates the wits, tends to clear the mind, and often helps those engaged in it to get a better grasp of their subject than they had before; while, mankind being essentially fighting animals, a contest leads the public to interest themselvs in questions to which, otherwise, they would giv but a languid attention. On the bad side, controversy is rarely found to sweeten the temper, and generally tends to degenerate into an exchange of more or less effectiv sarcasms. Moreover, if it is long continued, the original and really important issues are apt to become obscured by disputes on the collateral and relativly insignificant questions which hav cropped up in the course of the discussion. No doubt both of these aspects of controversy hav manifested themselvs in the course of the debate which has been in progress, for some months, in these pages. So far as I may hav illustrated the second, I expect repentance and desire absolution; and I shall endeavor to make amends for any foregone lapses by an endeavor to exhibit only the better phase in these concluding remarks.

The present discussion has arisen out of the use, which has become general in the last few years, of the terms "Agnostic" and "Agnosticism."

The people who call themselvs "Agnostics" hav been charged with doing so because they hav not the courage to declare themselvs "Infidels." It has been insinuated that they hav adopted a new name in order to escape the unpleasantness which attaches to their proper denomination. To this wholly erroneous imputation, I hav replied by showing that the term "Agnostic" did, as a matter of fact, arise in a manner which negativs it; and my statement has not been, and cannot be, refuted. Moreover, speaking for myself, and without impugning the right of any other person to use the term in another sense, I further say that Agnosticism is not properly described as a "negativ" creed, nor indeed as a creed of any kind, except in so far as it expresses absolute faith in the vitality of a principle which is as much ethical as intellectual. This principle may be stated in various ways, but they all amount to this: that it is wrong for a man to say that he is certain of the objectiv truth of any proposition unless he can produce evidence which logically justifies that certainty. This is what Agnosticism asserts; and, in my opinion, it is all that is essential to Agnosticism. That which Agnostics deny and repudiate as immoral is the contrary doctrin, that there are propositions which men ought to believe, without logically satisfactory evidence; and that reprobation ought to attach to the profession of disbelief in such inadequately supported propositions. The justification of the Agnostic principle lies in the success which follows upon its application, whether in the field of natural or in that of civil history; and in the fact that, so far as these topics are concerned, no sane man thinks of denying its validity.

Still speaking for myself, I add that, though Agnosticism is not, and cannot be, a creed, except in so far as its general principle is concerned; yet that the application of that principle results in the denial of, or the suspension of judgment concerning, a number of propositions respecting which our contemporary ecclesiastical "Gnostics" profess entire certainty. And in so far as these ecclesiastical persons can be justified in the old-established custom (which many nowadays think more honored in the breach than the observance) of using opprobrious names to those who differ from them, I fully admit their right to call me and those who think with me "Infidels;" all I hav ventured to urge is that they must not expect us to speak of ourselvs by that title.

The extent of the region of the uncertain, the number of the problems the investigation of which ends in a verdict of not proved, will vary according to the knowledge and the intellectual habits of the individual Agnostic. I do not very much care to speak of anything as unknowable. What I am sure about is that there are many topics about which I know nothing, and which, so far as I can see, are out of reach of my faculties. But whether these things are knowable by anyone else is exactly one of those matters which is beyond my knowledge, though I may hav a tolerably strong opinion as to the probabilities of the case. Relativly to myself, I am quite sure that the region of uncertainty—the nebulous country in which words play the part of realities—is far more extensiv than I could wish. Materialism and idealism; theism and Atheism; the doctrin of the soul and its mortality or immortality—appear in the history of philosophy like the shades of Scandinavian heroes, eternally slaying one another and eternally coming to life again in a metaphysical "Nifelheim." It is getting on for twenty-five centuries, at least, since mankind began seriously to giv their minds to these topics. Generation after generation, philosophy has been doomed to roll the stone uphill; and, just as all the world swore it was at the top, down it has rolled to the bottom again. All this is written in innumerable books; and he who will toil through them will discover that the stone is just where it was when the work began. Hume saw this; Kant saw it; since their time, more and more eyes hav been cleansed of the films which prevented them from seeing it; until now the weight and number of those who refuse to be the prey of verbal mystification has begun to tell in practical life.

It was inevitable that a conflict should arise between Agnosticism and theology; or rather I ought to say between Agnosticism and ecclesiasticism. For theology, the science, is one thing; and ecclesiasticism, the championship of a foregone conclusion* as to the truth of a particular form of theology, is another. With scientific theology, Agnosticism has no quarrel. On the contrary, the Agnostic, knowing too well the influence of prejudice and idiosyncracy, even on those who desire most earnestly to be impartial, can wish for nothing more urgently than that the scientific theologian should not only be at perfect liberty to thrash out the matter in his own fashion, but that he should, if he can, find flaws in the Agnostic position, and, even if demonstration is not to be had, that he should put, in their full force, the grounds of the conclusions he thinks probable. The scientific theologian admits the Agnostic principle, however widely his results may differ from those reached by the majority of Agnostics.

But as between Agnosticism and ecclesiasticism, or, as our neighbors across the Channel call it, clericalism, there can be neither peace nor truce. The cleric asserts that it is morally wrong not to believe certain propositions, whatever the results of a strict scientific investigation of the evidence of these propositions. He tells us that "religious error is, in itself, of an immoral nature."† He declares that he has prejudged certain conclusions, and looks upon those who show cause for arrest of judgment as emissaries of Satan. It necessarily follows that, for him, the attainment of faith, not the ascertainment of truth, is the highest aim of mental life. And, on careful analysis of the nature of this faith, it will too often be found to be not the mystic process of unity with the divine, understood by the religious enthusiast—but that which the candid simplicity of a Sunday scholar once defined it to be. "Faith," said this unconscious plagiarist of Tertullian, "is the power of saying you believe things which are incredible."

Now I, and many other Agnostics, believe that faith, in this sense, is an abomination; and though we do not indulge in the luxury of self-righteousness so far as to call those who are not of our way of thinking hard names, we do feel that the disagreement between ourselvs and those who hold this doctrin is even more moral than intellectual. It is desirable there should be an end of any mistakes on this topic. If our clerical opponents were clearly aware of the real state of the case, there would be an end of the curious delusion, which often appears between the lines of their writings, that those whom they are so fond of calling "Infidels" are people who not only ought to be, but in their hearts are, ashamed of themselvs. It would be discourteous to do more than hint the antipodal opposition of this pleasant dream of theirs to facts.

The clerics and their lay allies commonly tell us that, if we refuse to admit that there is good ground for expressing definit convictions about certain topics, the bonds of human society will dissolve and mankind lapse into savagery. There are several answers to this assertion. One is, that the bonds of human society were formed without the aid of their theology, and in the opinion of not a few competent judges hav been weakened rather than strengthened by a good deal of it. Greek science, Greek art, the ethics of old Israel, the social organization of old Rome, contrived to come into being without the help of any one who believed in a single distinctiv article of the simplest of the Christian creeds. The science, the art, the jurisprudence, the chief political and social theories of the modern world hav grown out of those of Greece and Rome—not by favor of, but in the teeth of, the fundamental teachings of early Christianity, to which science, art, and any serious occupation with the things of this world were alike despicable.

Again, all that is best in the ethics of the modern world, in so far as it has not grown out of Greek thought or barbarian manhood, is the direct development of the ethics of old Israel. There is no code of legislation, ancient or modern, at once so just and so merciful, so tender to the weak and poor, as the Jewish law; and if the gospels are to be trusted, Jesus of Nazareth himself declared that he taught nothing but that which lay implicitly, or explicitly, in the religious and ethical system of his people.

> And the scribe said unto him, Of a truth, teacher, thou hast well said that he is one; and there is none other but he: and to love him with all the heart, and with all the understanding, and with all the strength, and to love his neighbor as himself, is much more than all whole burnt-offerings and sacrifices (Mark xii, 32, 33).

Here is the briefest of summaries of the teaching of the prophets of Israel of the eighth century; does the Teacher, whose doctrin is thus set forth in his presence, repudiate the exposition? Nay, we are told, on the contrary, that Jesus saw that he "answered discreetly," and replied, "Thou art not far from the kingdom of God."

So that I think that even if the creeds, from the so-called "Apostles'" to the so called "Athanasian," were swept into oblivion; and even if the human race should arrive at the conclusion that whether a bishop washes a cup or leaves it unwashed, is not a matter of the least consequence, it will get on very well. The causes which hav led to the development of morality in mankind, which hav guided or impelled us all the way from the savage to the civilized state, will not cease to operate because a number of ecclesiastical hypotheses turn out to be baseless. And, even if the absurd notion that morality is more the child of speculation than of practical necessity and inherited instinct, had any foundation; if all the world is going to thieve, murder, and otherwise misconduct itself as soon as it discovers that certain portions of ancient history are mythical, what is the relevance of such arguments to anyone who holds by the Agnostic principle?

Surely the attempt to cast out Beelzebub by the aid of Beelzebub is a hopeful procedure as compared to that of preserving morality by the aid of immorality. For I suppose it is admitted that an Agnostic may be perfectly sincere, may be competent, and may hav studied the question at issue with as much care as his clerical opponents. But, if the Agnostic really believes what he says, the "dreadful consequence" argufier (consistently I admit with his own principles) virtually asks him to abstain from telling the truth, or to say what he believes to be untrue, because of the supposed injurious consequences to morality. "Beloved brethren, that we may be spotlessly moral, before all things let us lie," is the sum total of many an exhortation addressed to the "Infidel." Now, as I hav already pointed out, we cannot oblige our exhorters. We leave the practical application of the convenient doctrins of "reserve" and "non-natural interpretation" to those who invented them.

I trust that I hav now made amends for any ambiguity, or want of fullness in my previous exposition of that which I hold to be the essence of the Agnostic doctrin. Henceforward, I might hope to hear no more of the assertion that we are necessarily Materialists, idealists, Atheists, theists, or any other ists, if experience had led me to think that the proved falsity of a statement was any guarantee against its repetition. And those who appreciate the nature of our position will see, at once, that when ecclesiasticism declares that we ought to believe this, that, and the other, and are very wicked if we don't, it is impossible for us to giv any answer but this: We hav not the slightest objection to believe anything you like, if you will giv us good grounds for belief; but, if you cannot, we must respectfully refuse, even if that refusal should wreck morality and insure our own damnation several times over. We are quite content to leave that to the decision of the future. The course of the past has impressed us with the firm conviction that no good ever comes of falsehood, and we feel warranted in refusing even to experiment in that direction.

In the course of the present discussion it has been asserted that the "Sermon on the Mount" and the "Lord's Prayer" furnish a summary and condensed view of the essentials of the teaching of Jesus of Nazareth, set forth by himself. Now this supposed Summa of Nazarene theology distinctly affirms the existence of a spiritual world, of a heaven, and of a hell of fire; it teaches the fatherhood of God and the malignity of the devil; it declares the superintending providence of the former and our need of deliverance from the machinations of the latter; it affirms the fact of demoniac possession and the power of casting out devils by the faithful. And, from these premises, the conclusion is drawn that those Agnostics who deny that there is any evidence of such a character as to justify certainty, respecting the existence and the nature of the spiritual world, contradict the express declarations of Jesus. I hav replied to this argumentation by showing that there is strong reason to doubt the historical accuracy of the attribution to Jesus of either the "Sermon on the Mount" or the "Lord's Prayer;" and, therefore, that the conclusion in question is not warranted, at any rate on the grounds set forth.

But, whether the gospels contain trustworthy statements about this and other alleged historical facts or not, it is quite certain that from them, taken together with the other books of the New Testament, we may collect a pretty complete exposition of that theory of the spiritual world which was held by both Nazarenes and Christians; and which was undoubtedly supposed by them to be fully sanctioned by Jesus, though it is just as clear that they did not imagin it contained any revelation by him of something heretofore unknown. If the pneumatological doctrin which pervades the whole New Testament is nowhere systematically stated, it is everywhere assumed. The writers of the gospels and of the Acts take it for granted, as a matter of common knowledge; and it is easy to gather from these sources a series of propositions, which only need arrangement to form a complete system.

* Let no one therefore seek to know from me what I know I do not know, except in order to learn not to know.

* Let us maintain, before we hav proved. This seeming paradox is the secret of happiness (Dr. Newman, Tract 85, page 85).

In this system, man is considered to be a duality formed of a spiritual element, the soul; and a corporeal * element, the body. And this duality is repeated in the universe, which consists of a corporeal world embraced and interpenetrated by a spiritual world. The former consists of the earth, as its principal and central constituent, with the subsidiary sun, planets, and stars. Above the earth is the air, and below it the watery abyss. Whether the heaven, which is conceived to be above the air, and the hell in, or below, the subterranean deeps, are to be taken as corporeal or incorporeal is not clear.

However this may be, the heaven and the air, the earth and the abyss, are peopled by innumerable beings analogous in nature to the spiritual element in man, and these spirits are of two kinds, good and bad. The chief of the good spirits, infinitly superior to all the others, and their creator as well as the creator of the corporeal world and of the bad spirits, is God. His residence is heaven, where he is surrounded by the ordered hosts of good spirits: his angels, or messengers, and the executors of his will throughout the universe.

On the other hand, the chief of the bad spirits is Satan—the devil par excellence. He and his company of demons are free to roam through all parts of the universe, except heaven. These bad spirits are far superior to man in power and subtlety, and their whole energies are devoted to bringing physical and moral evils upon him, and to thwarting, so far as their power goes, the benevolent intentions of the supreme being. In fact, the souls and bodies of men form both the theater and the prize of an incessant warfare between the good and the evil spirits—the powers of light and the powers of darkness. By leading Eve astray, Satan brought sin and death upon mankind. As the gods of the heathen, the demons are the founders and maintainers of idolatry; as the "powers of the air," they afflict mankind with pestilence and famin; as "unclean spirits," they cause disease of mind and body.

The significance of the appearance of Jesus, as the messiah or Christ, is the reversal of the satanic work, by putting an end to both sin and death. He announces that the kingdom of God is at hand, when the "prince of this world" shall be finally "cast out" (John xii, 31) from the cosmos, as Jesus, during his earthly career, cast him out from individuals. Then will Satan and all his deviltry, along with the wicked whom they hav seduced to their destruction, be hurled into the abyss of unquenchable fire—there to endure continual torture, without a hope of winning pardon from the merciful God, their father; or of moving the glorified messiah to one more act of pitiful intercession; or even of interrupting, by a momentary sympathy with their wretchedness, the harmonious psalmody of their brother angels and men, eternally lapped in bliss unspeakable.

The straitest Protestant, who refuses to admit the existence of any source of divine truth, except the Bible, will not deny that every point of the pneumatological theory here set forth has ample scriptural warranty; the gospels, the Acts, the epistles, and the Apocalypse assert the existence of the devil and his demons and hell, as plainly as they do that of God and his angels and heaven. It is plain that the messianic and the satanic conceptions of the writers of these books are the obverse and the reverse of the same intellectual coinage. If we turn from scripture to the traditions of the fathers and the confessions of the churches, it will appear that in this one particular, at any rate, time has brought about no important deviation from primitiv belief. From Justin onward, it may often be a fair question whether God, or the devil, occupies a larger share of the attention of the fathers. It is the devil who instigates the Roman authorities to persecute; the gods and goddesses of paganism are devils, and idolatry itself is an invention of Satan; if a saint falls away from grace, it is by the seduction of the demon; if a heresy arises, the devil has suggested it; and some of the fathers † go so far as to challenge the pagans to a sort of exorcising match, by way of testing the truth of Christianity. Medieval Christianity is at one with patristic, on this head. The masses, the clergy, the theologians, and the philosophers alike, liv and move and hav their being in a world full of demons, in which sorcery and possession are everyday occurrences. Nor did the Reformation make any difference. Whatever else Luther assailed, he left the traditional demonology untouched; nor could anyone hav entertained a more hearty and uncompromising belief in the devil than he and, at a later period, the Calvinistic fanatics of New England did. Finally, in these last years of the nineteenth century, the demonological hypotheses of the first century are, explicitly or implicitly, held and occasionally acted upon, by the immense majority of Christians of all confessions.

Only here and there has the progress of scientific thought, outside the ecclesiastical world, so far affected Christians that they and their teachers fight shy of the demonology of their creed. They are fain to conceal their real disbelief in one-half of Christian doctrin by judicious silence about it; or by flight to those refuges for the logically destitute, accommodation or allegory. But the faithful who fly to allegory in order to escape absurdity resemble nothing so much as the sheep in the fable who—to save their lives—jumped into the pit. The allegory pit is too commodious, is ready to swallow up so much more than one wants to put into it. If the story of the temptation is an allegory; if the early recognition of Jesus as the son of God by the demons is an allegory; if the plain declaration of the writer of the first epistle of John (iii, 8), "To this end was the son of God manifested that he might destroy the works of the devil," is allegorical, then the Pauline version of the fall may be allegorical, and still more the words of consecration of the eucharist, or the promis of the second coming; in fact, there is not a dogma of ecclesiastical Christianity the scriptural basis of which may not be whittled away by a similar process.

As to accommodation, let any honest man who can read the New Testament ask himself whether Jesus and his immediate friends and disciples can be dishonored more grossly than by the supposition that they said and did that which is attributed to them; while, in reality, they disbelieved in Satan and his demons, in possession and in exorcism?*

An eminent theologian has justly observed that we hav no right to look at the propositions of the Christian faith with one eye open and the other shut. ("Tract 85," p. 29.) It really is not permissible to see with one eye, that Jesus is affirmed to declare the personality and the fatherhood of God, his loving providence, and his accessibility to prayer, and to shut the other to the no less definit teaching ascribed to Jesus in regard to the personality and the misanthropy of the devil, his malignant watchfulness, and his subjection to exorcistic formulæ and rites. Jesus is made to say that the devil "was a murderer from the beginning" (John viii, 44) by the same authority as that upon which we depend for his asserted declaration that "God is a spirit" (John iv, 24).

To those who admit the authority of the famous Vincentian dictum that the doctrin which has been held "always, everywhere, and by all" is to be received as authoritativ, the demonology must possess a higher sanction than any other Christian dogma, except, perhaps, those of the resurrection and of the messiahship of Jesus; for it would be difficult to name any other points of doctrin on which the Nazarene does not differ from the Christian, and the different historical stages and contemporary subdivisions of Christianity from one another. And, if the demonology is accepted, there can be no reason for rejecting all those miracles in which demons play a part. The Gadarene story fits into the general scheme of Christianity, and the evidence for "Legion" and their doings is just as good as any other in the New Testament for the doctrin which the story illustrates.

It was with the purpose of bringing this great fact into prominence, of getting people to open both their eyes when they look at ecclesiasticism, that I devoted so much space to that miraculous story which happens to be one of the best types of its class. And I could not wish for a better justification of the course I hav adopted than the fact that my heroically consistent adversary has declared his implicit belief in the Gadarene story and (by necessary consequence) in the Christian demonology as a whole. It must be obvious, by this time, that, if the account of the spiritual world given in the New Testament, professedly on the authority of Jesus, is true, then the demonological half of that account must be just as true as the other half. And, therefore, those who question the demonology, or try to explain it away, deny the truth of what Jesus said, and are, in ecclesiastical terminology, "infidels" just as much as those who deny the spirituality of God. This is as plain as anything can well be, and the dilemma for my opponent was either to assert that the Gadarene pig-bedevilment actually occurred, or to write himself down an "infidel." As was to be expected, he chose the former alternativ; and I may express my great satisfaction at finding that there is one spot of common ground on which both he and I stand. So far as I can judge, we are agreed to state one of the broad issues between the consequences of Agnostic principles (as I draw them), and the consequences of ecclesiastical dogmatism (as he accepts it), as follows:

Ecclesiasticism says: The demonology of the gospels is an essential part of that account of that spiritual world, the truth of which it declares to be certified by Jesus.

Agnosticism (me judice) says: There is no good evidence of the existence of a demonic spiritual world, and much reason for doubting it.

Hereupon the ecclesiastic may observe: Your doubt means that you disbelieve Jesus; therefore you are an "Infidel" instead of an "Agnostic." To which the Agnostic may reply: No; for two reasons: first, because your evidence that Jesus said what you say he said is worth very little; and, secondly, because a man may be an Agnostic in the sense of admitting he has no positiv knowledge; and yet consider that he has more or less probable ground for accepting any given hypothesis about the spiritual world. Just as a man may frankly declare that he has no means of knowing whether the planets generally are inhabited or not, and yet may think one of the two possible hypotheses more likely than the other, so he may admit that he has no means of knowing anything about the spiritual world, and yet may think one or other of the current views on the subject, to some extent, probable.

The second answer is so obviously valid that it needs no discussion. I draw attention to it simply in justice to those Agnostics who may attach greater value than I do to any sort of pneumatological speculations, and not because I wish to escape the responsibility of declaring that, whether Jesus sanctioned the demonological part of Christianity or not, I unhesitatingly reject it. The first answer, on the other hand, opens the whole question of the claim of the biblical and other sources, from which hypotheses concerning the spiritual world are derived, to be regarded as unimpeachable historical evidence as to matters of fact.

Now, in respect of the trustworthiness of the gospel narrativs, I was anxious to get rid of the common assumption that the determination of the authorship and of the dates of these works is a matter of fundamental importance. That assumption is based upon the notion that what contemporary witnesses say must be true, or, at least, has always a prima facie claim to be so regarded; so that if the writers of any of the gospels were contemporaries of the events (and still more if they were in the position of eye-witnesses) the miracles they narrate must be historically true, and, consequently, the demonology which they involve must be accepted. But the story of the "Translation of the Blessed Martyrs Marcellinus and Petrus," and the other considerations (to which endless additions might hav been made from the fathers and the medieval writers) set forth in this review for March last, yield, in my judgment, satisfactory proof that, where the miraculous is concerned, neither considerable intellectual ability, nor undoubted honesty, nor knowledge of the world, nor proved faithfulness as civil historians, nor profound piety, on the part of eye-witnesses and contemporaries, affords any guarantee of the objectiv truth of their statements, when we know that a firm belief in the miraculous was ingrained in their minds, and was the presupposition of their observations and reasonings.

Therefore, although it be, as I believe, demonstrable that we hav no real knowledge of the authorship, or of the date of composition, of the gospels, as they hav come down to us, and that nothing better than more or less probable guesses can be arrived at on that subject, I hav not cared to expend any space on the question. It will be admitted, I suppose, that the authors of the works attributed to Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, whoever they may be, are personages whose capacity and judgment in the narration of ordinary events are not quite so well certified as those of Eginhard; and we hav seen what the value of Eginhard's evidence is when the miraculous is in question.

* It is by no means to be assumed that "spiritual" and "corporeal" are exact equivalents of "immaterial" and "material" in the minds of ancient speculators on these topics.

† Tertullian (Apolog. adv. Gentes, cap. xxiii) thus challenges the Roman authorities: Let them bring a possessed person into the presence of a Christian before their tribunal; and, if the demon does not confess himself to be such, on the order of the Christian, let the Christian be executed out of hand.

To Noah, Ye Ancient Mariner.

Great captain, navigator, mariner,
In that dire period of heavy wet,
When all the world was one vast fish pond, sir,
All humans lost, save thee and family set!
Oh, what a dreary voyage, old Captain Noah,
Was that upon the waters wild and sweeping;
What possibilities were in thy keeping—
The future of the race thy shoulders bore!
Great spook! suppose thy craft, the jibstay furled,
Had sprung her luff, jibed over short, mis-stayed,
Where then had been the glory of the world,
Its empires mighty and the peanut trade?
O skipper true, thou weren't a wide sea rover,
Though once, I read, were more than "half seas over!"

A Protest.

On Memorial day the First Regiment Oregon National Guard attended a special regimental service by Rev. Arthur J. Brown, chaplain, at the First Presbyterian church, Portland. It was the first time in its history that the regiment had turned out to attend "divine" service.

After an outburst of patriotism and glorification of the result of the war of the Rebellion, this young chaplain viewed the political dangers from his standpoint, and paid a tribute to the "best young blood of that proud city." Their patriotism was unquestioned, but this militant minister demanded as usual an admixture of a Christian element to make this government of the highest quality. He concluded his oration as follows:

I do not use the word Christian in a sectarian sense. I speak not now of Protestantism, nor Catholicism, nor of any other ism. I simply speak of the common Christianity which recognizes God as the supreme disposer of human events and the source of all moral obligation. In this sense I affirm that our patriotism should be regulated by Christian considerations, and should hav reference to the laws of God. For this is a Christian land.

The men who crossed the sea to find a home in the New World were Christian men. "They were Puritans, Huguenots, Scotch, Scotch-Irish, Dutch, and German Presbyterians, Quakers, Episcopalians, and Roman Catholics, but all alike Christians. Beyond any other equally various and numerous set of men known in human history, they were earnest Christians, and they came here for the very purpose of crystallizing their faith in imperishable institutions." The nation was born and nurtured in Christianity. The common law is based on Christian principles. From the beginning Christianity has been recognized by Sabbath laws and official chaplains, and by Thanksgiving days. To-day about one-half of our adult population is composed of actual communicants of Christian churches, and Sunday-school scholars and adherents swell the number to an overwhelming majority. This is a Christian land by virtue of its foundation, its history, and its preponderance of Christian people, and it is only just that those who repudiate Christianity for themselvs individually should recognize the fact that, though we do not hav a national church, we do hav a national religion.

But whether this be admitted or not, it must be admitted that every nation is bound to obey the laws of God. He is sovereign, and his sway is absolute and immutable. Man is no more free to disobey the laws of God than he is to disobey the laws of the state. In either case, he may do so if he wishes, but if he does, he exposes himself to retribution. It is true, church and state are separate, and we wish them to remain so; but separation does not involve immunity from religious obligation. The state has nothing to do with the church, but it does not follow that it has nothing to do with God. "The state is the people themselvs, acting in their organic capacity through the machinery of law. It is self-evident, therefore, that the state or collectiv body must hav all the qualities which belong to its constituent members. If people are rational, the state will be rational; if moral, then moral; and none the less, if the people be religious, will the state they compose be religious. It is simply absurd that a man can be thoroughly convinced that God is a moral governor, who will demand an account of the deeds done in the body, as an individual, and then be perfectly oblivious of the existence and of the claims of God as soon as he begins to act politically as a citizen. There cannot be two laws for Christians—one to govern the relations of individuals, and the other the relations of nations." Men may not do in their corporate capacity as a state what they may not do as individuals. "They must make and execute laws in conformity to the known will of God" or be adjudged disobedient. What shall we say, then, of our responsibility for this Sabbath desecration, this tampering with divorce, these open saloons, these public brothels? How shall we defend many public acts and laws and usages which contravene the commands of God? Hav we not as a people been allowing an irreligious minority a license to which they are not in reason or charity entitled, and by our acquiescence not only permitted a nation of Christian people to do unchristian things, but brought ourselvs into just condemnation? I do not say that we hav a right to make any man religious—to his own master he standeth or falleth, but I do say that we hav a right to demand of the irreligious man at least an outward respect for the laws of God; that we hav a right to say to him: Whether you will serve your maker or not is for you to determin; but this is a Christian community, and you shall not violate our Sabbaths by your bands of music, your games of ball, your open stores; nor shall you injure the public morals by your brothels and saloons and gambling hells.

If the land is endangered by political indifference, much more is it endangered by this moral indifference. History has clearly shown the indissoluble connection between national prosperity and national righteousness. I look back and I see proud Babylon's fall; I see haughty Judea in the dust; I see imperial Rome, once mistress of the world, in ruins; I see scattered thickly o'er time's shore the wreck of empires and of thrones, and high over them all I see written in letters of fire and blood, "The nations that shall not serve thee shall perish; yea, that nation shall be utterly wasted."

Comrades, let us, the young men of this city, remember that God reigns, and that no prosperity can be enduring which is not the result of his blessing. Let us seize his purposes concerning our land, and to the extent of our influence apply them. Let us remember that the strength of a nation lies, not so much in the invincibleness of its fortifications, as in the character of its citizens. Let us, as members of the national guard, exemplify a Christian patriotism. "You," said Colonel Lee, "and not the regulars, are the true army of the United States, and the one on which it would hav to depend in time of peril." Then be loyal. Be proud of the uniform you wear, and allow no unworthy or disloyal man to disgrace it. The responsibility is fast falling upon us. The veterans of the war are dropping rapidly out of the ranks. The youngest are getting gray. They who escaped the shot and shell of battle are falling thickly before the fire of the great enemy, death. How they go! Not a day passes but that

> The muffled drum's sad roll has beat
> The soldier's last tattoo.

Hats off, gentlemen! for yonder come the riderless steeds, the reversed arms, the funeral dirge! Something is here for tears. The men who saved their country are going to their long home. Sound the retreat. They who never fled before are vanquished now. Fire the parting volley. Fill up the grave. Lights out. Let

> Glory guard, with solemn round,
> The biouvac of the dead.

But listen! The ground trembles with the measured tramp, tramp of a great host. Look! Yonder comes a mighty army. The step is firm and elastic. The movement is rhythmic and strong. They keep coming, till as far as the eye can reach are solid masses of men. Who are they? They are the young men of the republic, ready as were their fathers to fight for their country, if need be; ready, if fighting be not needed, to show that

> Peace hath her victories,
> No less renowned than war.

In them is the nation's hope; in their purity and patriotism her defense. Comrades, shall we not exult in our country's call?

> Our fathers to their graves hav gone.
> Their strife is past, their triumph won;
> But sterner trials wait the race
> Which rises in their honored place—
> A moral warfare with the crime
> And folly of an evil time.
> So let it be. In God's own might
> We gird us for the coming fight.
> And, strong in him whose cause is ourr,
> In conflict with unholy powers,
> We grasp the weapons he has given—
> The light and truth and love of heaven.

The veteran and sturdy reformer, Lois Waisbrooker, is now residing in the city of Portland, and she replied with her customary trenchant vigor, but the Portland papers would not publish, so she sends her protest for the benefit of THE TRUTH SEEKER readers:

EAST PORTLAND, ORE., June 5, 1889.

EDITOR Oregonian: As I am told that your paper is cosmopolitan in character, I venture to hope that you will permit a few words in defense of justice, or rather a protest against the rank injustice which is done a class of your readers in the published reports of what was said by the Christian ministry of your city on Decoration day.

In looking over said statements, I find that some of those to whom we are largely indebted for our independence from foreign rule, though not personally named, were really abused, and I feel moved to ask a few questions.

Are Infidels "the dangerous offspring of Old World oppression and ignorance?" as was stated in your report of the Rev. Mr. Houghton's address.

Is it just that our public speakers should eulogize the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States, and at the same time speak with contempt of him whose pen wrote, whose brain formulated, that immortal Declaration, and of those Infidels who signed it, as they do when they class Infidels with those who keep brothels and saloons?

Where is the proof that Infidels are less moral or worse citizens than those who call themselvs Christians?

Did not Infidels rally to the front? Were they not as patriotic? Did they not lay down their lives as readily for their country in the war of the Rebellion as did Christians?

If you strike from the list of those who hav helped to make the nation glorious the names of the Infidels, will not that list be considerably shortened?

I hav been a devoted Christian. It was when I knew much less than I do to-day. I was honest, tried to do what I felt was right then, and I know I am as good a woman now as I was then. I hav no longer the fear of death before my eyes, but realize more fully the responsibilities of life; and I know of many such good men and women who do not believe in the claims made by Christians, and in their name as well as my own I protest against being classed with all that is vile, as is now done in our public prints when reporting such remarks as were made on Decoration day by men called divines, reverends.

Their statements are not just. They are not true. They are insults to many of our dead and living soldiers. Insults hurled at them upon a day when men and women meet to honor—what? the Christians? No; the soldier. Memorial day was not appointed to honor Jesus, but the soldiers, and without regard to creed or belief.

If Christianity must be built up at the expense of truth and justice, will the world be the better for it?

A man or woman is not vicious or immoral simply because he or she does not believe in the Christian religion, neither is one necessarily good because one does so believe.

If any religion is so weak that it cannot afford to tell the truth of an opponent it has not the elements of perpetuity. But if the fault is in the advocates, they certainly deserve rebuke for weakening that which they claim to honor. In reading portions of the reported speeches, one naturally infers that the speakers do not consider Infidels as having any rights that Christians are bound to respect.

Respectfully, MRS. LOIS WAISBROOKER.

The Constitutional Convention.

About one-third of the members of the convention are lawyers, and the only article thus far acted upon is that of the judicial department. This article contains minute provisions in regard to the rights and powers of judges, which tend to strengthen the judicial power at the expense of the legislativ branch.

No action has yet been taken by the committee on electiv rights. The following section was submitted to the committee on elections to be made part of the article on elections:

SECTION 1. Every person of the age of twenty-one, or upwards, belonging to either of the following classes, who shall hav resided in the state one year, in the county sixty days, and in the precinct or election district, in which such person offers to vote, thirty days next preceding any election, shall be a qualified elector at all elections under this constitution:

First. Citizens of the United States.

Second. Persons who were entitled to vote under the territorial laws prior to the adoption of this constitution.

Provided, That the legislature shall hav no power to deprive any citizen of the right to vote on account of color, race, or sex, nor for any cause, except as otherwise provided in this constitution, for crime punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary, of which such person shall hav been convicted by the regular course of law.

This provision prevents the disfranchisment of any voter, at any election, except for high crimes. No class discrimination on account of poll taxes, or other taxes, as tax or similar disqualifications would be an excuse for the party in power to strip others of the right to vote.

Mr. Bush's argument in favor of this provision was, in brief, as follows: The adoption of such a section, providing for no disqualification on account of sex, is required by the rule that a free government rests upon the consent of the governed, and that consent is expressed by the vote. This is demanded by the principles of the Declaration of Independence, the requirements of the enabling act, and the first section of the Fourteenth Amendment. This section knows no distinctions of color or sex.

The basis of the state is the equality of rights of its citizens. The state recognizes and regulates natural rights, but does not create them. So with political rights. The adult citizens are recognized at law, as entitled to the full enjoyment of personal rights, the full right to do business, to sue and be sued, and they hav an equal right to assist in the formation of the government, and in its control when formed. They organize governments for their mutual protection, and to define the limits within which the exercise of their individual powers can go without invading the equal rights of others. On this principle the Revolution was based.

Thomas Paine held: "The right of voting for representativs is the primary right by which other rights are protected. To take away this right is to reduce man to a state of slavery, for slavery consists in being subject to the will of another."

Abraham Lincoln echoed the same sentiment when he said: "I go for all sharing the privilege of the government who assist in bearing its burdens, by no means excluding women."

The arguments against equal suffrage to-day are the Tory arguments of a century ago against home rule in America. They are the same arguments which were used by church members in some of the colonies, by which they excluded from voting those who were not church-members—the same arguments which in other colonies were urged for the disfranchisment of Huguenots, Jews, and Catholics. The landed gentry in Virginia who confined suffrage to landowners thought the good of society demanded the disfranchisment of the poor. So when the colonies became independent states, they had the political favor, and denied to other citizens equal and universal suffrage. Hence the plea that suffrage was a privilege, instead of a right, rests, like African slavery, only on the doctrin that might makes right, and that those who hav seized political power hav the right to part with it or not, as they please. The logic is as strong in favor of taking away any right of property from any citizen as taking away the right to vote.

It is insisted that as women hav not now the right to vote, it is a question of privilege, and that the majority should decide that.

It was shown that the legislature of 1854 provided for voting in school elections without regard to sex. The school laws of 1858, 1871, and since then, hav a similar provision.

The so called common law rule of the husband and wife being one, and that one the man, was abolished in 1861, if it ever existed at all. The law of 1879 put the wife on the same footing as to civil rights with the husband. Hence these statutes recognizing the personality of the wife hav become rules of property in this territory, and all precedents based on the so-called common law rule hav no bearing on the question here. If the right to vote is a right of property, as held by Lord Chief-justice Holt in 1703, then the right to vote at school elections is a rule of property that is binding on the courts. If the right to vote is a personal right belonging to the adult male citizen, and necessary to secure him the equal protection of the laws, it is equally necessary for the adult female citizen. It is as necessary for the women of Washington as it is for the uneducated voters of the South, black and white.

The question is whether this convention will recognize the fact that the right of the legislature to extend the right to vote to women has never been questioned until August, 1888, a period of thirty-five years from the establishment of the territory. Is school suffrage hereafter to be confined to males? If the word "males" is inserted in the constitution as a qualification for voting, it will disfranchise woman without giving her an opportunity to vote on her own disfranchisment. If the legislature had power to pass a school suffrage law, it had power in 1883, 1886, and 1888 to pass a general election law removing this disqualification of sex.

The Bloomer case is now pending in the Supreme Court on appeal. An appeal bond was filed, citations issued, and the record sent to the clerk of the Supreme Court at Washington. It is a well-known rule of law that an appeal opens up a judgment, and it is not binding upon the appellant until finally decided.

But the opinion is not authority on any point not actually necessary to the decision of the case.

Again, it binds only parties and privies, and hence is not authority in any other case (Butler vs. Van Wyck, 1 Hill N. Y., 462; Woodgate vs. Fleet, 44 N. Y., 12).

Again, "there should be no reasonable doubt of the unconstitutionality of a statute before it should be overruled by judicial action" (People vs. Albertson, 55 N. Y., 56).

In the local option decision Chief-justice James held that a statute should not be overruled unless the dictates of sound reason compelled it.

The Bloomer case should be tested by these rules. It was similar in principle to the case of Murphy et al. vs. Ramsay et al., where the complaints alleged in effect that the persons were qualified voters, the defendants demurred, and the demurrer was sustained. The Supreme Court reversed the judgment on the ground that the demurrer admitted the fact averred, that the women who had offered their votes were qualified voters. The pleadings in the Bloomer case were more accurate in setting out the facts, and the demurrer, therefore, admitted that Mrs. Bloomer was a qualified voter of Spokane Falls. That fact was not in issue. There was no question arising in the record as to that. Mrs. Bloomer's right to damages was unquestioned.

The court, however, heard the case on appeal upon an agreed statement, that the only question was whether the legislature could permit a woman to vote. They held that under the organic law of 1853 it had no such power.

This conclusion was reached by the assumption that the repealing clause of the Revised Statutes of 1874, section 5,596, kept in force section 5 of the organic statute of 1853. Every section in force at the date of revision, in 1874, was included in some other section of the Revised Statutes, and therefore, according to the plain language of the repealing clause, was repealed. Every permanent provision, including those relating to suffrage, was included in the Revised Statutes, and no part of the act was left in force except a few donations. This is the plain language of section 5,596. There is no room for construction. The words used are used in their natural and common-sense meaning. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided that "the Revised Statutes must be treated as the legislativ declaration of the statute law on the subjects which they embrace on the first day of December, 1873" (United States vs. Bowen 100 U. S. 513).

It was an error of law to hold that the organic act of 1853 was in force at all, and that the legislature was bound by the supposed intent of that act. The Revised Statutes of 1874 governed the legislature of Washington. The legislature had full power over suffrage, except that section 1,860 required that the voters be either citizens of the United States, or persons who had declared their intention to become citizens.

This section is to be construed according to the well-known rules of interpretation:

1. That the intent is to be found in the words used.

2. That the words are to be taken in their plain and common sense signification.

3. That where words hav a legal signification, stated in the act, or in the constitution, they are to receive that interpretation.

4. That the courts cannot interpolate words to declare an intent contrary to the plain meaning of the words.

The words, "citizen of the United States," are defined in the Fourteenth Amendment, and in the Revised Statutes, in almost the same words, as including both sexes, and mean a nativ-born or naturalized person who is subject to the jurisdiction of the United States. It is used generically. It must, therefore, hav that meaning in section 1,860 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. Hence the Bloomer decision is founded on an error of law—on a false interpretation of sections 5,595 and 5,596, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as well as a false interpretation of the organic act of 1853. The opinion has no legal basis. It binds no woman but Mrs. Bloomer, and ought not to control the judgment nor the action of this convention.

The right of man to vote is a fundamental right of citizenship, a sacred right, as shown by the efforts made to giv the elector a free choice, a secret ballot, and to hav an honest count. If a right in the adult man it is a right in the adult woman. Sex is not a crime. It creates no legal disqualification as to civil rights. As to that, the courts hold that woman should hav the full protection of the laws as to her civil rights. But man protects his by his vote. The ballot takes the place of the bullet. Having the ballot, he regulates the property rights of woman, imposes taxes as he pleases, regulates the professions to suit his own notions, and often makes sex a reason for barring out woman from the practice of a profession. She has the same need for and the same right to the ballot that man has.

Having shown that the law of 1888 is valid, the convention must decide whether it will disfranchise woman or not. No such authority has been given it. Even if the election law is invalid, it has power to place woman upon an equality with man. It is justice to do it.

The Republican party is committed to equal suffrage by its platform, and it should defend the right of the women of Washington territory to the ballot as earnestly as it does that of the voters of the South, black and white. If not, let it be consistent, and advocate the repeal of the amendments, on the ground that the Southern states insist that the "good of society" demands it. If that is to be the test for the exercise of suffrage, and suffrage is to be limited by that test, in a short time the magnates of railroads will insist not only that the good of society requires that they shall hav absolute freedom of corporate management, but that they shall limit suffrage so that the wisest and best of their friends shall hav control of elections. In a short time a corporate oligarchy will dominate the government, and the people, the farmers, and workingmen will find they hav no longer a voice in the selection of their rulers.

OCCASIONAL.

Kansas Notes.

A storm occurred in Fort Scott lately, and, speaking of it, the Topeka Journal says that "among other things the 'vital fluid' struck the Congregational church." This is another instance in which God does not appreciate the gift which his people hav given him, and as Watson Heston says: "Lo! the owner sends his thunderbolts and knocks his property into splinters." What folly it is to build God-houses!

The Ottawa Republican asks: "What is the trouble with the theology of the Kansas statesmen?" and speaking of Ingalls and Kelley, the Republican says: "Senator Ingalls is regarded as an Agnostic, and THE TRUTH SEEKER of New York says that Congressman-elect Harrison Kelley is a Freethinker." I wish to inform the Republican that THE TRUTH SEEKER is right. Congressman Kelley is a Freethinker, and is a reader and subscriber of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Senator Ingalls is an Agnostic, and nearly all of the leading Kansas statesmen hav been such, or at least not many of them hav been religious men.

"An Atchison man who was converted at the Munhall meetings, forgot to say grace when he sat down to the table the other morning, and found that the beefsteak was burnt," says the Kansas City Star. My impression is that he did not forget. He just did not feel like thanking the Lord for burnt steak.

Says the Kansas City News: "It was a little Kansan who prayed: 'Please God excuse me while I knock the stuffin' out of Nellie.' She was a Kansas girl and was tickling his feet while he was praying." A nice message to send God, wasn't it? Yet, I suppose, God excused him.

"An Atchison man rejected salvation because ice was too high to keep it fresh," says the Emporia Republican. A good excuse. They will all do the same in the long run. Salvation is hard to keep fresh, so I advise them all to reject it, and they will not hav to waste their money on ice.

The Destroying Power of Poverty.

Many years ago I read a sermon by Henry Ward Beecher upon the text, "The destruction of the poor is their poverty." Since then numerous sermons hav been written upon the same text, but the great difficulty about most of them is that the men who preach hav, as a general thing, never worn the shoe of poverty, and therefore do not know where it pinches. And so it may be worth while for one who has felt its force to consider in what way poverty does destroy.

Human beings possess, it is said, a fourfold nature, physical, mental, moral, and social, upon the harmonious development of whose parts depends their possibility of excellence. If, therefore, poverty tends to check the unfolding of any portion of this complex nature, each division of which requires time, space, and opportunity for growth, its effect is deadly indeed.

A short time ago, in an article in a Grange paper on the care of horses and how to improve them, I observed the statement that, "Above all things the mother should be kindly treated, easily worked, and properly fed." The chief of the bureau of vital statistics of New York says that, "without counting the better class of flats, we hav now 32,390 tenements, in which 1,100,000 people liv." Now, as the nature of woman is much more complex than the nature of a horse, and as the wives of workingmen are constantly employed from early morning till late at night, it is impossible that children born in those tenement houses can be what the children of men should be, for the nature of the mother having had no opportunity for proper development, the capacities of the child will inevitably suffer.

Goldsmith has said:

> Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
> Where wealth accumulates and men decay.

And another poet has said:

> Of what avail is plow or sail,
> Or land or men, if freedom fail?

Workingmen, as a rule, hav to work ten hours a day. Most of them hav to spend half an hour in the morning in walking to their work, and the same time in the evening in walking home. As a result, their physical nature is in a state of utter weariness; their mental powers are in a poor condition for reading or reflecting upon municipal or other matters; they hav little opportunity for social communion unless they attend clubs or go to saloons; for the cultivation of their moral nature there is certainly small chance.

In Mr. Carnegie's article on "Wealth," which appeared in the North American Review of June, 1889, he says that, "It is a waste of time to criticise the inevitable," and in speaking of the law of competition he remarks, "While the law may be sometimes hard for the individual, it is best for the race, because it insures the survival of the fittest in every department." If on some future occasion you can spare me space in your valuable paper, I will consider the questions as to whether this state of things is inevitable, and what individuals would be the fittest to survive.

The Battle in Sweden.

From the London Freethinker.

Freethinkers in every part of the world will learn with sympathy and regret of the sentence of our heroic Swedish comrade, Viktor E. Lennstrand, to six months' further imprisonment, three months at Stockholm and three months at Malmo, for the "crime" of expressing his opinion of Christianity at these places. He has, we presume, appealed, or at any rate judgment is not yet put into execution, as we hear he is still lecturing, and will continue to do so up to the very day of his incarceration. What further action English Freethinkers will take in the matter it is for them to declare, but certainly the prosecution in Sweden and that of Dr. Voelkel in Germany show the necessity for a close international organization for common support to those in trouble, and common resistance to the enemy, who is scotched but far from killed. We trust the Paris congress, to which the Swedes will send a representativ, will devote its earnest attention to this important matter.

A conference of the Utilistska Samfundet will be held at Stockholm on August 3d and 4th, and measures will doubtless be taken to uphold the society against clerical persecution. The Fritänkaren is by no means suppressed, and will, we trust, be stoutly sustained not only by Swedish, but by all Scandinavian Freethinkers, during the time its chief editor is in prison. Freethought has fairly broken ground in Sweden, and though it is evident there will be many a hard fight ere freedom of expression is completely gained, yet

> Freedom's battle once begun,
> Though baffled oft, is ever won.

Individuals may suffer, but opinions cannot be suppressed. The cause is in good hands. The men who are upohlding it are emphatically of the right stuff. Persecution instead of stamping out the movement will only spread it, and Sweden will awake from its lethargy of pietism and place itself abreast of the leading continental nations in the matter of freedom of thought.

Southern Negro Superstitions.

From the Milwaukee Sentinel.

Women in the North hav trouble enough over the servant girl question, but their ways are paths of pleasantness compared with those of Southern women—except that the Southern woman is less disturbed over the more serious situation. When a Virginia woman wants to change a girl she is compelled to go at least three days without any girl at all. The kitchen help is black, of course, and superstitious. No colored girl will go into a house until three days after the retiring help has vanished, for fear of being "tricked"—in other words, hoodooed, placed under a spell—by the dismissed help. Whatever the colored person doesn't understand he fears. He is full of superstitions, believes in good luck from the rabbit foot when it is in his own possession, and in bad luck when it is "put on him." Not long ago a large number of negroes were on a Virginia railroad platform waiting for a train to take them to a picnic ground. A Boston drummer, with a face as serious as a parson's, took a piece of chalk and a rabbit foot and in the most business-like way began to make crosses on the backs of the negroes, and touch them with the rabbit foot. The crowd broke for the woods in a panic, and there was no picnic that day.

A Colored Preacher Disposes of the Doctrin of Evolution.

BIRMINGHAM, July 15.—"Are we sons of God, or gorillas?" was the subject of a sermon preached at Tuscaloosa, Ala., yesterday, by the Rev. William Harris, the leading colored minister of the town. Dr. Peter Price, superintendent of the state insane asylum, recently read a paper before the State Teachers' Association, on the subject of mind development, in which he advocated the theory of evolution. The Rev. Mr. Harris read this paper and determined to preach a sermon on the subject. He declared that men were the sons of God, and that all who believed in evolution were Infidels and blasphemers. He convinced his congregation that they were in no way related to gorillas, but were sons of God.

J. H. BURNHAM, of Saginaw, Mich., will lecture in Kent, O., Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, August 31st, September 1st and 2d, before the yearly mass convention of Freethinkers for Portage county, O. Friends in Akron, Alliance, Cleveland, and Warren are invited to participate and continue the grand work of mental emancipation by engaging him to work up an interest in their respectiv towns. By order of Kent Secular Union executiv committee: Joseph Heighton, president; Marius Heighton, secretary; L. G. Reed, treasurer; G. W. Andrew, I. R. Marsh.

Communications.

Things in Washington Territory.

The ministers of the territory are organizing to secure in the seventh article the exemption of church property from taxation. All the religious, sectarian, and kindred societies will try to secure the same exemption for their property, and it is claimed that this request will be granted. The principle of equal taxation of all property, except that owned by the public, should be enforced by constitutional provision. Liberals throughout the territory should send up their protest against exemption of private property from taxation, whether owned by a church, private educators, benevolent societies, organized for the benefit of their members, or private hospitals, kept up mainly for the benefit of the owner.

As the session is likely to last but thirty-five days, there is no time to lose in sending in protests. In so-called common law days in England, when taxes were assessed mainly on lands, the churches were assessed the same as individuals. The exemption here has been in part the outgrowth of the status of the church as part of the government. In Massachusetts and Maryland taxes were assessed for the support of religion; and so the established church claimed to be a part of a Christian commonwealth, an integral part of the government, and its property free from taxation as part of the public property of the state. Under our government, where no state church can be established, the reason for this rule has ceased to exist, and church property, and all property owned and controled by private persons and corporations, should be taxed on the same footing as the farms of the farmer, and the homes of the merchant and the mechanic. W. S. Bush.

Olympia, W. T., July 7, 1889.

The Origin of Christianity—Paul's Epistles.

We hav, in the New Testament, fourteen epistles of Paul; but Marcion, Paul's admirer and disciple, who spent his life in an effort to prevent the corruption of the faith of the primitiv church, by the introduction of Jewish elements, as he claimed that Paul had done, had but ten; and, if Paul had written more, Marcion would hav had them, and the fact would hav been known; therefore, I must believe that he wrote but ten.

Irenæus, Tertullian, and Epiphanius, charge Marcion with corrupting the epistles. Tertullian and Epiphanius made this charge after Marcion's death, as Irenæus probably did, for he was hardly contemporary with Marcion. But Manes, in the third century, says they were corrupted, and Tertullian, in the third century, quotes them, mainly as we hav them, that is, in harmony with the belief of the advocates of Judaism, of whom Tertullian was one, and in direct antagonism to the teachings of Paul and Marcion. What is the explanation of this? Why, that after Marcion's death, the corrupted version of Tertullian was recognized as genuin.

And now we hav fourteen epistles, only four of which, what are considered competent critics, attribute to Paul, and many doubt these four, while not one of the fourteen is in harmony with what Marcion tells us of Paul's belief. The trouble with all these critics has been ignorance of Paul's real belief. Therefore, they were utterly incompetent to pass judgment upon the epistles. His belief is the key to the mystery, and this is the solution. Paul, who lived nearly a century B.C., wrote ten epistles consistent with his theory of an aerial or spiritual Jesus, and his aversion to the Hebrew scriptures. At Marcion's death, nearly three centuries afterward, these epistles were changed by the substitution of a crucified Jesus for the spiritual savior, and by making Paul the advocate instead of the opponent of the scriptures. But the work was imperfectly done. Hence the confusion. Still, enough was left of what Paul had written, to show that the obscurity is not his fault, that he had the faculty of saying what he wished, with such clearness, that there could be no doubt as to his meaning. Their obscurity, if there were no other evidence, is sufficient proof of their corruption. But the four epistles to the Hebrews, to Titus, and to Timothy, which are not mentioned by Marcion, are forgeries.

Now, there is an account in Acts, xxi, and xxii (inserted through a blunder of the compiler, probably), which is a singular confirmation of Marcion, where Jews, from Asia, seize, beat, and threaten to kill Paul, "for teaching all men, everywhere, against the law." This charge could never hav been made had Paul been an advocate of the law. The incident must hav happened. And then Paul is made, in his defense, to tell the ridiculous story of his adventure on the way to Damascus, and the vision in the temple at Jerusalem, both pure fabrications in the support of the corrupted faith, of which Tertullian was an advocate.

How remarkably this account of Paul's opposition to the law confirms Marcion's account of his belief! They were both members of the Asiatic or Buddhist church, and Marcion did not believe in the inspiration of any gospels, epistles, or men, and his indorsement of Paul raises him in our estimation.

Nor can I believe that Paul ever persecuted any one. There was nothing in the primitiv faith to make a man a persecutor. A religion without a hell or punishments of any kind, where instruction took the place of threats, would not breed persecutors. And it is a fact worth noting that the epistles—and Paul probably wrote portions of some of them—are singularly free from threats. Christ threatened hell with all the bitterness of a modern revivalist. But, in the epistles, hell does not exist. The wrath of God is mentioned but twice. In Thessalonians, we hav eternal destruction from the face of the earth, at Christ's second coming, which has been indefinitly postponed, and in Hebrews—a forgery—we twice hav God as a consuming fire. A modern exhorter, with so little of the sensational, would preach to empty pews.

The detestation of Paul and Marcion by the early Christians, who denounced them both as heretics, and Marcion's devotion to Paul's teachings, are facts always to be kept in view when investigating the character and belief of Paul. S. P.

Was Paul a Gnostic?

Mr. Palmer has given a very interesting account of the attempt made by Marcion and other Gnostics to free God from responsibility for the great sins of which he was guilty according to the Old Testament. Rather than worship a being who commanded massacres of little children, and who rewarded the daughters of Lot by making them mothers of great nations, I would turn Gnostic at once. Marcion claimed to follow Paul rather than the other apostles; so did the Paulicians, who afterward protested against the worship of Jehovah as immoral; and these claims had solid foundation. All accounts of early Christianity show that it was at first a form of Judaism. Neither Jesus nor the original apostles seem to hav been willing to let a heathen become a Christian unless he would become a Jew also and keep the law of Moses strictly. Paul was the first to carry Christianity outside of Judaism. It is hard to realize the importance of a controversy which is now so thoroughly obsolete; but it must be kept in mind in order to understand Paul's place in history. If it had not been for him, we might never hav heard of Jesus or Christianity. He insisted that people who were not Jews might become Christians, and not hav to abstain from pork, or keep the Sabbath, or observe any other of the merely ceremonial precepts ascribed to Moses. This made Christianity a great religion. The original apostles resisted this innovation; but it was carried through in spite of them. They seem to hav been at first inclined to treat Paul as a heretic; but he turned out in the end to be the most orthodox of all. What better model for a reformer like Marcion?

So far we all agree. The question is whether Paul went as far as Marcion. Paul freed Christianity from bondage to Jewish ceremonies; but did he also try to free it from the degradation of worshiping a bloody God? We see Presbyterians, Baptists, Methodists, Episcopalians, Unitarians, Universalists, and Roman Catholics all claiming that Paul and Jesus believed just as they do. They are, almost without exception, perfectly honest in this claim; and they are all in the wrong. Adherents of a thousand different creeds claim that the Bible is all on their side; and yet that book is so full of contradictions that no one can possibly agree with it. Henry Ward Beecher said: "I am a Calvinist; for I believe just as Calvin would do if he were a man of this century." I suspect that Marcion agreed with Paul to about that extent. It was the same principle, but in a very different degree of development.

One reason for thinking so is the high honor which has been paid to Paul by the Christians in every century as an apostle and an inspired author. Ever since he succeeded in opening the door to the gentiles, his orthodoxy and authority hav been beyond question. But he would not even hav been acknowledged to be a Christian if he had not accepted Jesus as the anointed of Jehovah. If he had rejected Jehovah like Marcion, he would hav been put like Marcion under the ban as a heretic.

Then again, we find that the apostles, even after they had permitted heathens to become Christians without becoming Jews also, insisted on having the Mosaic law strictly observed by all the Jewish Christians. This narrow ground was finally abandoned; but there is no evidence that Paul differed from the other apostles on this point. On the contrary, the book of Acts, chapter xxi, represents him as here remaining conservativ until the end of his ministry. There is some reason to believe that this chapter was written by his friend Luke; and there is no reason to suppose that the author, whoever he may hav been, wished to make Paul appear any farther behind the orthodox standard than was actually the case. The existence of such a story seems to me to prove that Paul had not taken by any means so advanced a position as Marcion and other Gnostics.

The evidence, too, of the epistles, especially that to the Galatians, is very strong to me, who believe them genuin. So does the author of "Supernatural Religion," like most scholars. But I am willing, for argument's sake, to admit that they may be forged. Is not a forgery an imitation of the genuin article? No forger could succeed if he did not copy all the prominent features of the original. Now, one of the most prominent features, in all the so-called Pauline epistles, is reverence for the Old Testament as an inspired book and for Jesus as the Christ or Jewish messiah. This is especially marked in the third and fourth chapters of Galatians; but all the epistles regard Christianity as an outgrowth of Judaism. Every reader must, I think, see that this is their fundamental position. No forger would hav taken it, if it had not been generally known to be essentially the view held by Paul. Marcion, according to the author of "Supernatural Religion" (pages 142 and 143), used these epistles in substantially the present text, though he, like later scholars, considered that to the Hebrews spurious. Marcion was obliged to admit the genuinness of the other epistles, in their present form, despite their failure to support him fully. These epistles show, I think, that Paul cannot be called a Gnostic in any other sense than the vague one in which he has been called a Protestant and an Evolutionist. His spirit was on the whole liberal and progressiv; but his ideas were those of his day and his race. F. M. Holland.

Tender-Toed Liberals.

It is decidedly comical to read the letters of some Liberals, protesting against the free expression of opinion, when this is the grand distinction between Liberalism and Christianity. Such Liberals are hardly out of the theological shell, a part of which they carry on their backs to keep off the fierce rays of controversy. Poor, little, tender chicks! How they shiver! If they want quiet, they ought to join a Protestant church, where a little—just a little—one-sided discussion is indulged once in a while; or a Roman Catholic church, where priests do all the thinking and speaking. There it is still quieter.

If I am not very much mistaken, the quality which tender-toed Liberals bemoan is exactly what took Freethinkers out of the church, and made Liberals of others who were never in it—free speech! that disturber of the peace of the church, foe of kingcraft, destroyer of slavery mental and physical.

And now some Liberals yearn for harmony. Oh, how they do love harmony! They will find it in the graveyard, or among the intellectually dead. If they will run a cotton string up their spines it will stiffen their backs, and make them robust enough to stand without a prop.

One of this species, a few weeks ago (June 1st), tells us that "Dr. Severance arrogantly and opprobriously makes a thrust at Colonel Ingersoll for one of his eloquent and truthful utterances. It is unfortunate. It is only opening the way for a new fight, which is damaging to our good cause. The tendency is to weaken us and strengthen the enemy."

Pitiful. His soul is strung to shreds in the flapping breeze of controversy.

Now, suppose she did "arrogantly and opprobriously make a thrust" at the colonel for an "eloquent and truthful" utterance. Can't he stand it? Can Liberalism be damaged by debate? If so, here is one that proposes to kill it, if he can. Such nambypamby Liberalism as that is too slimsy to stand.

Dr. Severance is a Spiritualist. I am a Materialist. I must say, and I will say it if it gores my theory to death, that Dr. Severance floored the colonel by the strong weapon of logic. The colonel would hav been safe, if he had kept within his accustomed Agnostic lines. He was off his guard, became gnostic, and got hit. The best thing a Materialist can do is to own up his defeat, take his bearings, and a fresh start. Even Colonel Ingersoll is not infallible. Like a sensible man, he will tell you so himself.

But there was not one "arrogant or opprobrious" word in Dr. Severance's criticism, not one. The article was strong, pointed, logical. Such writing makes the tender-toed tremble from head to foot, and vow "there's goin' to be a storm!"

Hear our Hanoverton haunted friend: "And now there is a row in the camp in behalf of Spiritualism—an ism without a handle, an ism undemonstrable, an ism that never conveyed any intelligence to mankind of the slightest benefit." Then he adds that his view ought to "satisfy all who are willing for the truth to reign." No arrogance about that! I hav investigated Spiritualism for thirty-five years, and Materialist though I am, I do not feel warranted in saying that it is "undemonstrable." That is worse than the colonel put it. It reminds me of Josh Billings's saying, "I would rather not know anything than to know something that ain't so." Certainly it is not so that the "ism never conveyed any intelligence to mankind of the slightest benefit." "An ism undemonstrable!" Who knows?

This Hanoverton believer in dead calm was almost shocked. "The old quarrel between Mr. Reynolds and Jamieson was of no good to the general public." How did you find that out? From the letters I received I judge it did much good. The question was, The Proper Demeanor in Debate. I argued that neither lecturers nor clergymen are justified in employing personal epithets, rancor, or abuse. But I am not debarred from employing all the weapons of reason in talking to the question, whatever it may be, and loading to the mouth of the cannon with Anglo-Saxon shell. That is my way, and whoever does not like it is welcome to keep out of range.

I am glad that our Hanoverton brother has the liberty which he says is "unfortunate," even though he cannot distinguish the difference, any more than the Christian church can, between "free speech" and a "quarrel," because it reveals his own inconsistency, and furnishes me texts; for, if the expression of difference of opinion is quarreling, then he, himself, is guilty of the very thing he condemns! This is the glaring weakness of all this class of writers.

He goes so far as to become the self-appointed "regulator" of the "many contributors" of THE TRUTH SEEKER. "Well, I guess I will let them talk, but they must agree better."

And forgot to set us the example! If the free thought and free speech writers do not agree, then what? "Let them." The church has been trying for centuries to make mankind "agree better." Perhaps Hanoverton has a recipe that the church would like to buy. W. F. JAMIESON.

A Pious Tale.

From the Agnostic Journal.

I am going to interrupt the regular course of these papers, in order to reply to a correspondent, who signs himself "Crede Experto," especially as the argument he uses is a stock one, and is often flourished in our faces as insurmountable. It is simply this: Here is an institution called a Christian church. It must hav been founded on something, and the name Christian suggests that of Christ. Christ, therefore, must hav lived, or there would be no Christian. He must hav been born, or there would be no Christmas day. He must hav died, or there would be no Good Friday. The institutions presuppose the historic facts. I think I hav stated the argument in the strongest possible way. I wish to do so, and to meet it fairly.

The quotation from Tacitus, referred to by "Crede Experto," is from the "Annals," xv, 44: "Christians took their name from their founder, one Christ, put to death in the reign of Tiberius, by his procurator, Pontius Pilate." The quotation looks suspicious on the very face of it; but Tacitus died at the beginning of the second century, and the "Annals" were written by Poggio, at the request of Cosmo de Medici, in the middle of the sixteenth century. Poggio's MS. is still in the library of Florence, where anyone can examin it; and no reference to the "Annals," or quotation from them, was ever made till toward the close of the sixteenth century. In fact, the twelve books of the "Annals" are a known literary forgery. The last six books were published first, and the first six books forty-six years afterward. Poggio received for his forgery five hundred gold sequins. The less said about these "Annals" the better. It is one of the most disgraceful impositions of the Catholic church, and worthy to be ranked with the Isodorian Decretals, which Pope Pius VI. confessed were a scandal and wholly indefensible.

It would be an easy task to fill a whole number of the Agnostic Journal, in proof of the fallacy of "Crede Experto's" argument. Every history of every nation would supply matter; but we will, on the present occasion, refer only to the chickens of Compostella.

Compostella is a city of Spain. It is the capital of Galicia, and is very noted for its church, dedicated to San Iago, or St. James. The archbishop has an annual revenue of 60,000 ducats (say £30,000), a good round sum, collected mainly from the gifts of pilgrims, who used to visit the church. And what was the great attraction there? Simply a cock and hen, which lived exactly seven years; on the seventh year the hen laid exactly two eggs, one of which produced a male bird, and the other a female. The two successors lived exactly seven years, laid two eggs, and so it went on for centuries.

Pilgrims went in crowds from all parts of the world to visit this church and see these wonderful birds. Every pilgrim bought a feather as a relic, and the archbishop got an income of £30,000 a year. No matter how many sackfuls of feathers were sold, the two fowls always remained in full plumage. Thousands and tens of thousands were sold annually, but this wonderful cock and hen were not one feather the less clad. The wonder does not cease here. The newly-fledged brother and sister sprang, Minerva-like, full-fledged from their shells. Their size was exactly the size of the parent birds; their color was precisely the same; their length of life was the same; they laid their two eggs in the seventh year and died; and the miraculous reproduction of their feathers remained a standing miracle.

Lucius Marineus Siculus, in his "Rerum Hispanicārum Scriptorés," vol. ii, p. 805, tells us he had himself seen the fowls, and can testify to the truth of these statements. I will translate the passage I refer to, and, that you may be assured that what I say is minutely accurate, I will giv in a footnote his ipsissima verba. "It is a marvel to all," he says, "that, although every pilgrim who comes to Compostella takes a feather, and the pilgrims are numberless, yet this cock and hen show no defect of plumage. What I here testify I hav seen, and I know that my testimony is true."*

Here we hav every condition required by "Crede Experto." I might almost say every condition exaggerated. A yearly show, a vast sum of money collected, a living cock and hen, the testimony of contemporaneous spectators, and witnesses of what passed before their very eyes. There must be some truth here, one would think. There must be some foundation for this wonderful story.

Bishop Patrick, in his "Parable of the Pilgrims," xxxv, 430-434, givs the tale with even greater minuteness of detail.

Udal ap Rhys repeats it in his "Tour Through Spain and Portugal," pp. 35–38.

It is inserted in the great national hagiography of the Bollandistes (in fifty-seven folio volumes), entitled "Acta Sanctorium," vol. vi, p. 45.

Pope Calixtus mentions it as a standing miracle in the church.

Monseigneur Guérin, lord chamberlain to the last and present pope, in 1880, says: "Cette histoire a été raconté par un grand dombre d'auteurs. Les peintes-verriers du moyen âge l'ont souvent reproduite. On frappa des médailles commémorative de l'événement. Une de ces médailles a été retrouvée, de nos jours, dans la Seine" (Les Petites Bollandistes, vol. v, p. 504).

That is, this history (!) has been recounted by numerous authors. Painters-on-glass were fond of reproducing the subject on their windows. Medals hav been struck in commemoration of the cock and hen. And one of these medals was picked up lately in the bed of the river Seine.

I could add several Spanish extracts to corroborate these high and mighty authorities, but it would be only gilding refined gold, and adding another perfume to the violet. I think we may feel assured of the general "fact"—that a cock and hen are or were for centuries exhibited at St. James, Compostella; that they lived exactly seven years, and laid exactly two eggs in the last year of their lives; that both died at the same time; that the two eggs produced one a male and the other a female bird, minutely like the parent stock; that these two new birds repeated the same round; that thousands and thousands of pilgrims every year bought the feathers of these birds to the tune of £30,000 a year; but, though sackfuls and cartloads of feathers were sold, the two fowls never lost a feather.

Priests were appointed to look after these fowls, buildings were erected for their accommodation, a church was richly endowed by the sale of their feathers, pilgrims in gangs went to see them, and numberless historians hav written their gospels.

Bishops and archbishops, lord chamberlains and popes, authors and painters, medalists and engravers, hav all borne testimony to the truth of the wondrous story.

Can anything more be added in corroboration? Then let us apply the argument of "Crede Experto." These medals and customs, these names and "histories," these "buildings and institutions," must be based on a foundation of facts. They presuppose a tale; as the existence of a Christian church presupposes that a person called Christ really existed. Let us see. Happily we know, from the same identical sources, the fons et origo of these wonderful birds. The "history" is as follows:

Some pilgrims, on their road to Compostella, stopped at a hospice in La Calzada (please recollect this name, as we shall refer to it again by and by). The daughter of the innkeeper solicited a young Frenchman to pass the night with her, but he refused; so she secretly put into his wallet a silver cup, and, when he was on the road to Compostella, she went and accused him to the alcayde of theft. As the cup was found in his possession, the magistrate at once condemned the young man to be hanged.

His parents continued their pilgrimage, and, after eight days, returned to La Calzada, when, to their amazement, they found their son still alive. The mother went instantly to inform the alcayde; but he replied: "Woman, you are mad! I would just as soon believe these two roast pullets are alive, which you now see on my table, as your son, who has been hanged for eight days."

No sooner had he said these words than the two roast pullets actually rose up alive. Chanticleer crowed most lustily, and Madam Partlet clucked her loudest. The alcayde, scared out of his senses, was about to rush out of doors when he was met full butt by the heads and feathers of the two pullets scampering into the room like mad to rehabilitate their resuscitated bodies. I need not stop to ask how they crowed and clucked without their heads. That is a very small matter indeed. The roast pullets were alive again, and their heads and feathers restored in the manner I hav said.

The wonderful cock and hen of the alcayde were, of course, taken in grand procession to San Iago, of Compostella, and there they lived in the sanctity of holiness for seven years, laid two eggs, and died; the two eggs produced a cock and a hen, which likewise lived for seven years, laid two eggs, and died; and this went on for centuries without intermission or deviation. Pilgrims flocked to Compostella to see the pullets, and every pilgrim put a feather in his cap in proof of his pilgrimage.* Cartloads of feathers were sold year after year, but the two pullets were always in full plumage.

I told you not to forget the name of La Calzada, and I will now tell you why. In 1109 St. Dominick of Calzada was represented in Christian art with a cock and hen in one hand and a corde de pendu, or hangman's rope, in the other, in allusion to the rope that was put round the neck of the young Frenchman. If the tale is not true, how can "Crede Experto" explain this representation of St. Dominick?

On the grand door of the basilica of the Vatican is the representation of a friar entering the kitchen of the monastery. A couple of chickens are on a spit before a fire. And in another compartment is represented a friar blessing pullets which are seizing their feathers fluttering about them, crowing most lustily, and clucking in the seventh heaven of delight. This, of course, is a representation of the tale given above. Below I hav given the Latin version, that no possible loop may be left to hang a doubt on.† This is no fairy tale, but sober church history. Without the anecdote how can "Crede Experto" explain the custom?

My dear sir, I think you put the cart before the horse. The fact is, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the "history" is made up to account for the custom; it is not that the custom has arisen from the history. There is a city called Rome, and the tale of Romulus was invented to account for the city. There were "ten" priests appointed in ancient Rome to take charge of certain books of political value, and the myth about the sybil was concocted to hoodwink the people. In time interested persons named streets after these myths, established annual festivals, built temples, and struck medals. Our Humber and Severn hav their myths also. Pelops was invented to account for the name Peloponnesus, Europa and her cow to account for the word Europe, Argos to account for Argos in Greece. Scholars say Argos means a plain, and this part of Greece is so called because it is the lowlands and not the highlands of Greece; Europe is so called from two Greek words, meaning "far-seeing," or, "having an extended view;" but scholars murder myths most unmercifully.

To bring this paper within scope of the subject under discussion, I will conclude with a Parthian shot. I believe I am strictly within the bounds of a known fact when I state there is no place near Jerusalem which corresponds either to "Mount Calvary" or to the tomb "hewn out of the rock" in which the body of Jesus is said to hav been laid. Strange! passing strange! that the sponge, the crown of thorns, the fragil reed, and perishable linen used as cerements, should all hav remained, but the solid rock and mount should be no more seen! Even the milk of the "Virgin mother" is shown in some Christian churches; but the solid bench of the solid rock has melted into thin air. JULIAN.

* "Magnæ quoque admirationis est, quod omnes per hanc urbem transeuntes peregrini, qui sunt innumerabiles, galli hujus et gallinæ plumam capiunt, et nunquam illis plumæ deficiunt. Hac ego testor, propterea vidi et interfui."

* To "cut your stick" is a phrase derived from pilgrims to the Holy Land, who cut a palm stick in proof of their pilgrimage. To "put a feather in your cap" may, therefore, refer to those pilgrims of Compostella.

† "Gallum capiunt et gallinam, et in ecclesiam transferunt magne solemnitate. Quæ ibi clause res admirabiles et Dei potentiam testificantes observantur, ubi septennio vivunt; hunc enim terminum Deus illis instituit; et in fine septennii antequam moriantur, pullum relinquunt et pullam sui coloris et magnitudinis; et hoc fit in ecclesia quolibet septennio. . . . Ego Vidi [says the writer]. Ego testor propterea vidi, et interfui." "I hav seen and sure I ought to know."

An English Sunday.

From the London Church Review.

There is no use shutting our eyes to the growing secularization of Sunday. Paddington and Waterloo stations were crowded on Sunday week with well-dressed folk, who hav not the excuse of working all other days in the week, about to seek amusement on the Thames. It would be well if other riverside clergy imitated the example of those at Henley-on-Thames in inviting them to come to church in their flannels. Whatever excuses, however, there may be for going on excursions up the river, there can be none for theatrical performances on Sunday night in private houses, with the immense additional work they throw on servants. For some time there hav been such things on the quiet, but now they are boldly proclaimed in the light of day. At Mrs. Campbell Praed's on Sunday evening week Mr. Justin McCarthy's one-act comedietta, "The White Carnation," was performed for the first time in the presence of Mr. Irving, Mr. Toole, Mr. and Mrs. Kendal, Miss Forteecue, Lady Monckton, Lady Dorothy Nevill, Mrs. Lynn Linton, and many others.

In the Four New States.

It is hard to determin at the present time what the outcome for Liberalism will be in the four new states now preparing constitutions. By the time this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER reaches its Western subscribers most of the conventions will hav adjourned, and within a month or two the printed results of their work can be obtained.

In every convention there is a struggle between the Christians and the Liberals, with the latter, at the present outlook, a trifle ahead. But there is no telling how the final result will shape itself. The Christians hav the most men and money, and are able to scare the delegates with the biggest show of votes. In Washington, the ministers, with the exception of the Unitarians, are presenting a solid front for the exemption of church property from taxation. The preachers of the latter sect hav presented a petition against exemption. The evangelicals, however, claim to be sure of success, which will embolden all the sectarian private societies to try for the same exemption. Mr. W. S. Bush, attending the convention at Olympia, is doing what he can for the Liberal side, and desires protests against such exemption sent to all the delegates. If the convention has not adjourned when this reaches our readers we earnestly ask them to comply with this request without a moment's delay. The Liberals should show their strength everywhere.

In North Dakota the Christians are pushing hard for the recognition of "God" in the Constitution, and for all the sub-religious advantages following such recognition. R. C. Wylie, agent for the God-in-the-Constitution party, is on the ground, and is aided by all the local secretaries. The Sabbath Union has presented its claims, Elliot Shepard telegraphing a resolution which the Sabbath Union desires incorporated in North Dakota's organic law. The pious delegates applauded its reading, but the majority maintained a silence which is ominous to the resolution. It was referred to a committee, but its adoption is doubtful. There are progressiv men in North Dakota who will do what they can to make that state conform to American principles.

The convention at Helena, Montana, has refused to bring "God" or religion into its preamble, though urged to do so by the agents of the National Reform Association. In South Dakota the legislature will be allowed to fix exemptions, and it looks now as though the fight between the pietists and the Liberals must be fought before that body. If the Liberals will do their duty the chances are very favorable for making the government of South Dakota truly secular. But it is going to take work—hard, untiring work, and we hope the men will be found to do it. The local Secular Unions should look to it that it is done. They can obtain documents and help from Secretary Stevens of the national Union, and the Liberal lecturers on the coast will undoubtedly be only too willing to address any governmental assembly having jurisdiction in the matter.

Just as soon as the conventions adjourn and the reports of their doings are printed we shall let the people know who conquered in the war between progress and piety. But the Liberals need not fear that there will not be plenty of work left for them to do.

Mrs. Besant's Acceptance of Theosophy.

Mrs. Annie Besant, the brilliant coworker of Mr. Bradlaugh, and the ablest woman in England, has joined the Theosophists, and her apostasy from Atheism is exciting much acrid criticism from her friends. In the National Reformer, of which, before her conversion to Socialism, she was coeditor, Mrs. Besant briefly explains her conception of Theosophy, and the objects of the Theosophical Society, which are: "To found a universal brotherhood without distinction of race or creed; to forward the study of Aryan literature and philosophy; to investigate unexplained laws of nature and the psychical powers latent in man. On matters of religious opinion, the members are absolutely free. The founders of the society deny a personal God, and a somewhat subtle form of Pantheism is taught as the Theosophic view of the universe, though even this is not forced on members of the society. I hav no desire to hide the fact that this form of Pantheism appears to me to promis solution of some problems, especially problems in psychology, which Atheism leaves untouched."

In the Star, as we learn from the Freethinker, she is giving her reasons more fully, but these we hav not seen. Her first paper Mr. Foote calls a "perfect jargon," and instances some statements to support his dictum. He says: "We do know a little about history and logic, and Mrs. Besant appears to defy both. 'During the last quarter of each century,' she tells us, 'a mind wave sweeps over the West,' and she adds, 'witness the close of the last century.' This is a remarkably small basis for such a big generalization. As a matter of fact, too, the 'mind wave' swept over France during the first, second, and third quarters of the eighteenth century. The revolution was only the climax, like the boiling over of a saucepan. We are also wondering how Mrs. Besant discovered that the universe recognizes our divisions of time. 'Theosophy has no personal God,' but 'the universe is essentially Intelligence,' with a capital I. Theosophy, also, posits the absolute, about which a great deal of absolute nonsense has been written; and all the forces of nature 'are the workings of intelligent beings.' Mrs. Besant, after all, doesn't explain why she became a Theosophist, but she has evidently plunged right into it, as one might expect from her enthusiastic nature. Whether she will bring up pearls or mud from the bottom remains to be seen."

Mr. Standring, in his Radical, treats Mrs. Besant and her new fad more charitably. With others, Mr. Standring is a little shocked, but is awaiting a full explanation with dignified good-heartedness. "We are all now inquiring," he says, "What is Theosophy? and, as in the famous case of 'jesting' Pilate, many of us will not wait for an answer. The literature of Theosophy is abstruse, and the only exposition of its principles that we hav heard—in a lecture by Mr. Sinnett—left a somewhat confused impression upon the mind. No doubt, however, Mrs. Besant has carefully studied the subject and mastered its principles before joining the society which has been established for the propaganda of Theosophy. One effect of her action will be the enlightenment of the Freethought party upon a matter which has hitherto received little or no attention in its ranks."

In connection with Mrs. Besant's few words, Mr. Bradlaugh also states his opinion of her action. He is surprised and grieved, as he regards Theosophy as an intellectual humbug, though, of course, he puts it differently. The public announcement of Mrs. Besant's course has brought him many letters of inquiry as to what Theosophy is and what he thinks of it and his colleague, in response to which he says: "The word 'theosoph' is old, and was used amongst the Neo-platonists. From the dictionary, its new meaning appears to be 'one who claims to hav a knowledge of God, or of the laws of nature by means of internal illumination.' An Atheist certainly cannot be a Theosophist. A Deist might be a Theosophist. A monist could not be a Theosophist. Theosophy must at least involve dualism. Modern Theosophy, according to Madam Blavatsky, as set out in last week's issue, asserts much that I do not believe, and alleges some things which to me are certainly not true. I hav not had the opportunity of reading Madam Blavatsky's two volumes, but I hav read, during the past ten years, many publications from the pen of herself, Colonel Olcott, and other Theosophists. They appear to me to hav sought to rehabilitate a kind of spiritualism in Eastern phraseology. I think many of their allegations utterly erroneous, and their reasonings wholly unsound. I very deeply, indeed, regret that my colleague and coworker has, with somewhat of suddenness, and without any interchange of ideas with myself, adopted as facts matters which seem to me as unreal as it is possible for any fiction to be. My regret is greater as I know Mrs. Besant's devotion to any course she believes to be true. I know that she will always be earnest in the advocacy of any views she undertakes to defend, and I look to possible developments of her Theosophic opinions with the very gravest misgivings. The editorial policy of this paper is unchanged, and is directly antagonistic to all forms of Theosophy. I would hav preferred, on this subject, to hav held my peace, for the public disagreeing with Mrs. Besant on her adoption of Socialism has caused pain to both; but, on reading her article, and taking the public announcement made of her having joined the Theosophical organization, I owe it to those who look to me for guidance, to say this with clearness."

Mr. Bradlaugh's conception of Theosophy and its truth is near the mark. When D. M. Bennett was traveling around the world he encountered Madam Blavatsky, and was given an exhibition of what she called proofs of the truth of Theosophy. It seemed to be an exaggerated sort of Spiritualism, so far as its phenomena went, and its "philosophy" is, as Mr. Bradlaugh puts it, spiritualism in Eastern phraseology. To us it is as incomprehensible as the most attenuated metaphysics, and its language utterly meaningless, weighing its words by any accepted standard. It has no verifiable basis to start from, and it lands nowhere. Its literature is of the John the revelator style, and its methods of reasoning are thoroughly unscientific. Its "subtil form of Pantheism" is as senseless as the subtil form of reasoning by which the theologians support the dogma of the trinity. "Internal illumination" is not a scientific way of getting at facts, and the explanations of phenomena so obtained are not to be relied upon. When a person coils himself in a closet and expounds the mysteries of the universe by "subjectivity," we always think of the ancient medicin men who gained wisdom by continuous contemplation of their navels. The world has not profited much by their labors.

Mrs. Besant, however, is continuing her work on the school board, and it is not probable that her new intellectual departure will take her away from the practical reforms she is striving so hard and ably to bring about. Wherever she goes, or whatever she does, she will, we fancy, remain the same earnest champion of human rights that she has been during the years she has been England's foremost female Freethinker.

Mr. Wanamaker Helping His Religion.

Postmaster-general Wanamaker has ordered the arrest of one W. E. Reid, editor of the Spiritual Instructor and president of the Michigan State Association of Spiritualists, on the charge of fraudulently using the United States mail, because he "did knowingly and wrongfully profess to secure communications from spirit land to order." Mr. Reid was held in the sum of $500 to await the action of the grand jury which meets October 1st.

Mr. Wanamaker is evidently using his official position for all it is worth to protect his religion. Not content with his Sunday observance efforts, he has broadened his field, and will brook no rival in miracles and other-world knowledge; and anyone who pretends to outdo the ministers affording information regarding matters beyond the grave will feel the weight of his official hand. Mr. Wanamaker is a great man.

The trial, if it takes place, will afford a very good opportunity to prove Spiritualism true. The defense, of course, will insist that they do really obtain such messages, and therefore there can be no fraud. This is what all mediums claim, and if they can prove it to the satisfaction of the jury Spiritualism will gain immensely by this arrest, and pious John will find that he has thrown a boomerang which will bump his own forehead.

Aside from its being a golden opportunity for our Spiritualist friends, we cannot but condemn the action of the postmaster-general. If the law is enforced every advertiser whose goods may sometimes be termed unsatisfactory to the purchaser is also liable. Patent medicins are advertised to cure hundreds of diseases, and the mails are used to spread these advertisments. All of these patent medicins fail to do a hundredth part that is claimed for them, and if Mr. Wanamaker should get a grudge against their proprietors he could arrest them for using the mails for circulating fraudulent statements. If he were in the patent medicin business—as he is in the patent religion business—he would probably use his office to injure his rivals. Again, we fail to see that the United States is called upon to protect the people from humbug in Spiritualism, supposing the spirit messages are not genuin, any more than they are to protect them from bogus lightning-rod pedlers. If a man thinks a certain style of lightning rod is a good thing to hav, he has the unquestionable right to put it on his house, and to pay for it. If a believer in Spiritualism has faith that Mr. Reid can communicate with the other world, he certainly has the right to get him to do so. Catholics believe that the priests can intercede for and help the dead by masses and prayer, and millions of dollars are paid for such superstitious service. Why not arrest all the Catholic priests who advertise masses for money?

Mr. Wanamaker believes that once upon a time spirits came and walked the earth and talked to men, and even begot children. If they did these things then, why cannot they communicate with mortals now? Christianity is essentially spiritualism, and this arrest of a medium is only the persecution by the larger sect of the smaller. It is religious history repeated. But it will not harm the smaller sect, nor convince a single Spiritualist that his faith is unfounded, even though Mr. Reid should be unable to convince a jury that the answers he makes to sealed letters are direct communications from heaven.

The Division in Valley Falls.

In the last number of Fair Play E. C. Walker devotes nearly three of his wide columns to a repudiation of the methods of radical journalism which hav resulted in the indictment of the three men responsible for the publication of Lucifer. His fight, he says, is for principles, not words, and it is a great mistake, he thinks, to hazard essentials to uphold the non-essentials of form. The Liberal editor who does this and "insists upon giving correspondents a 'free paper' in which to flaunt such words as they may choose, no matter how much their recklessness may jeopardize himself and others and close ears to the words of vital truth, appears to us as own brother to the creedist who sees in rite and ceremonial and formula all that is vital in religion."

This is a sound conclusion, and one Mr. Walker might well hav formed many, many months ago. No writer has a right to ask an editor to run a risk of imprisonment in order that the writer may gratify a propensity to "call a spade a spade." Mr. Walker sees this clearly when he says: "Inseparably connected with the principle of liberty is the principle of responsibility, the cost principle. When a writer gives an indemnity bond for all costs which may accrue from the publication of his article, we will seriously consider his assumed right to appear in our paper in such guise as he may choose. Until that time comes his demand is simply a target for the ridicule of reasoning men and women. When the words he pens and asks us to print may put us into prison, or rob us of our earnings and destroy our business, the Liberal is certainly very wild who says that we are in duty bound to publish this writer's article; that if we do not we are 'censors,' we 'gag' a fellow-being! We may choose to print his article and take all risks, that is our right, but to ask it of us as a duty is the quintessence of absurdity, and it seems to us could be made only by one whose innermost thought-cells are yet poisoned by the dogma of vicarious atonement."

This declaration of principles, it appears, is brought out by criticism upon Mr. Walker for leaving Lucifer and establishing Fair Play, thus dividing the Radical forces of Valley Falls. Why he did this, he further explains, was because his methods and those of Mr. Harman differed fundamentally, beyond hope of compromise. Mr. Harman, innocent soul that he is, can see no reason why broad stories, abusiv letters, and compromising articles should not be defended on the ground of inherent natural right to say what one pleases, while Mr. Walker, more worldly-minded, steers his bark in the deep channels of ambiguity of expression, desiring that the purpose of an article be emphasized above its phraseology. Hence two papers in Valley Falls.

Our sympathies are entirely with both of these gentlemen. Mr. Harman's brave simplicity of character, seeing no evil in any words, however under the ban of prejudice, commands our admiration. He is a gentle, sincere man, acquainted with grief, and feeling deeply the wrongs inflicted upon the weak and helpless of the race. That he ever intended to do an evil act is beyond belief. His is the harmlessness of the dove, and to shut him up in prison because Joseph Anthony and others hav used him to parade before the public words which usage condemns would be a cruel act indeed.

Mr. Walker, too, is equally sincere, and a much stronger and more vigorous man. He has, too, some of the wisdom of the other animal mentioned in scripture, and perhaps a constitutional distaste for what he calls a witless story included in the indictment against him. With his objections to printing coarse words we are in hearty and thorough sympathy. As we wrote on the subject once before, the English language is comprehensiv and elastic enough to express all the ideas the average man or woman is likely to hav without borrowing from the vocabulary of the abandoned class. Mr. Walker usually has clear perceptions of the last principles he has acquired, and maintains them regardless though the effort should oblige him to abuse his innocent friends. Principles, principles, principles, is his cry; and in defending what he conceives to be principles, none can surpass him in sincerity and honesty of intention. That he stands in danger of going to prison for printing words the use of which he strongly condemns, will draw toward him the sympathy of all. If the prison walls shall finally engulf him, he will suffer for something he could not help and for which he was not responsible.

A Little Persecution.

This letter indicates a pretty state of things up at Goulais Bay:

"GOULAIS BAY, ONT., July 8, 1889.

"MR. EDITOR: My postmaster has received instructions to stop THE TRUTH SEEKER and all such publications, but that was only from the inspector.

"Now if my paper is stopped for good I can't be beaten, as I am only twenty-five miles from Sault Ste. Marie, Mich. But if it cannot be stopped please let me know how to proceed to get it, and oblige, Yours truly, J. H. EVANS."

We do not know what steps Mr. Evans must take. A lawyer there can tell him better. The Canadian officials hav no right to intercept his paper, and a suit against the offender would, if an honest jury were obtained, probably bring them to their senses.

The Christian Idea of Liberty.

The Christian Statesman, organ of the God-in-the-Constitution party, says:

"TO THE TRUTH SEEKER liberty and Atheism are synonymous and convertible terms."

This is not so. Atheism is a disbelief in a personal God, creator, and governor of the universe. Liberty is the right to do as one pleases, restrained only by consequences and the equal right to the same liberty of all other human beings. Liberty is freedom from restraint by other folks. But no man or woman would possess liberty if the Christian Statesman could succeed in its objects. Then we should be compelled by force to support a religion in which we did not believe; to observe a Sabbath because our Christian neighbors observed it; to hav our children educated in a superstition we abhorred; to swear by some Mumbo Jumbo who existed only in the ignorant imaginations of barbaric ancestors; to ask our neighbors what we might eat and drink; to acknowledge as a king an alleged divine person who probably never existed; to accept a "morality" which is in itself immoral; and to abjectly debase ourselvs before and support a lot of priests who had managed to make people think that they represented the will of "God." There would be no liberty at all in this country if the God-in-the-Constitution folks could compass their ends, for everyone who did not belong to the Roman or evangelical sects would be outlawed forever.

Liberty to a Christian means liberty to believe as his sect believes, and to make everybody else believe the same thing. Fortunately for progress and human rights the real Christians are in a minority. They had a majority in the colonial days, and everybody knows what they did.

Editorial Notes.

THE Rev. Dr. Harcourt, of San Francisco, thinks that there should be a law "that upon one day in seven a man shall abstain from labor and giv a brief time to the contemplation of God as he conceived him." We should like to see the law that will force a man to think in a certain direction, however easy it is for a law to coerce his actions.

A CHARLESTOWN, Mass., man claims to prove that the earth is flat and floats in water. Probably he got his idea out of the Bible. If not, he would best hunt up proof for it in that book, anyway. He can easily find it, as the scriptures can be made to prove each and every one of all the crazy doctrins that all the lunatics in the world can invent. And then, if his town is pretty bigoted, he will hav the additional advantage of being able to silence any doubter by law.

THERE is matter for observation in the inconsistent position into which enlightened churches hav got lately. On it Minot J. Savage remarks: "We are presented with the strange spectacle of hundreds, perhaps thousands, of ministers in all the different churches, who—in private, at least—will frankly confess that they share the belief of all intelligent men in the antiquity and the slow and gradual development of the race from the lowest beginnings. They believe in no Genesis story of either Eden or fall. And yet they go on preaching and administering the sacraments as if nothing had happened."

NEW JERSEY people are talking about reviving the ancient punishment of the ducking-stool in the case of a woman called a "common scold." Alongside New Jersey in lingering desire to revive barbarous punishments is Delaware, where the whipping-post is now used, and was defended by the governor in an oration on the Fourth. It is to be noted that these two states are the ones that hav most come to attention of late by attempts to repress Freethought speech. In Delaware they wished to arrest Colonel Ingersoll, and in New Jersey they did arrest Mr. Reynolds. As ever, barbarism and Christianity are found going hand in hand.

OUR friend W. Stewart Ross complains in his Agnostic Journal:

"G. J. Holyoake sent to the Boston Investigator, as original, a sonnet on Ingersoll by Joseph Ellis, which appeared some months ago in the Agnostic Journal. Secular Thought and THE TRUTH SEEKER hav also quoted the sonnet without acknowledging the source."

Mr. Holyoake sent the sonnet to all the journals mentioned, not saying to any of them that he had sent it to the others, or that it had previously appeared in print, and so each published it as original, which all were amply justified in doing. There was no intimation in Mr. Holyoake's friendly letter to us that the sonnet had ever been printed. The sonnet was in manuscript. We do not think, however, that Mr. Holyoake intended to rob anybody of proper credit.

THE editor of Lucifer has seen in the Kansas City Times a "statement that Judge Gardenhire of the circuit court, at Lafayette, Tenn., has charged the grand jury that a man is indictable for talking Infidelity in public." This is a curious statement for a judge to make, for the constitution of Tennessee says: "The free communication of thoughts and opinions is one of the invaluable rights of men, and every citizen may freely speak, write, and print on any subject, being responsible for the abuse of that liberty." In addition to this, Mr. W. S. Bailey for years conducted an Infidel paper at Nashville, Tenn., and if his conduct was indictable the Christians would hav imprisoned him. Tennessee is a very pious state, but hardly as much so as Judge Gardenhire alleges.

R. C. WYLIE, agent of the God-in-the-Constitution party at the North Dakota constitutional convention, writes to the Christian Statesman, under date of July 13th: "I hav had the opportunity of addressing the convention, and hav met with the committee on preamble and bill of rights. Two forms hav been proposed for the preamble. The first was introduced by Rev. Ezra Turner. It is substantially the same as that proposed by the National Reform Association. An effort was made to table it in the committee yesterday, but it did not succeed. Mr. Turner is more than a match for all the Secularists in the convention. The second form was introduced by Judge Carland and begins by imploring the aid of the sovereign ruler in the formation of the constitution. I am to meet with the committee on legislation this afternoon."

OUTSIDE of more scholarly circles, the churches are still throwing their weight against the rise of the doctrin of evolution. Dr. Peter Bryce, superintendent of the Alabama State Insane Asylum, and an expert on insanity of national reputation, recently read a paper before the Alabama Educational Association on "The Mind and Its Developments." He held that man came from primordial germs, and that he was a development of the lower order of beings. He held that mind was but a development of the instinct of animals, and that it differed from the animal reason only in degree, and not in kind. Mind, he held, was the result of organic forces, and when these forces stopped mind was gone. It has no entity of its own. When man dies his mind dies with him. It is not the sum of all the faculties, and hence not immortal. Dr. Bryce's paper created a great sensation in the meeting, and when he sat down half a dozen ministers were on their feet in an instant. After a heated discussion of the subject the association adopted a resolution reaffirming belief in the biblical account of creation, and declaring that the association did not indorse all the papers read before it.

Letters from Friends.

PARKERSBURG, ORE., June 25, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose money, for the idea occurs to me that you might get in a religious train of thought and stop my paper (or your paper), and to shut THE TRUTH SEEKER off would about shut my wind off, for I am by THE TRUTH SEEKER as Sam Jones is by the gospel—I about "livs on it." And if nothing serious happens, in the way of cyclones, earthquakes, floods, or Kansas chinch bugs, by the grace of God through his mysterious ways, we shall hav W. S. Bell and Samuel Putnam with us this month and next, and hope to giv them good welcome. A majority of the people here are Liberals, but a majority of them seem to hav an eye on Mrs. Grundy, who is in the orthodox woodpile. Well, well, some of the faithful to our cause are overhauling the woodpile. We'll rout her and her timid followers yet, God willing "and weather permitting." D. J. LOWE.

BERLIN, N. J., July 25, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of July 13th you say President Harrison remarked recently that America is safe from dangers from without, but must watch against its dangers within.

If the president was not blinded by the Bible, which, with its unjust, wrathful, revengeful, imaginary God, is nothing but a piece of men's crazy patchwork, to which each writer gave a patch of his own character, as I can abundantly prove by its own pages—if the president would giv up that old book that has so long blinded him, and giv his whole attention to the making and execution of just laws for all, without prejudice, hypocrisy, or bigotry, he would not hav to watch for internal dangers; he would see them everywhere, all around him. Please giv me space to remind Father Harrison of an internal danger which existed generation after generation, and which nearly all our presidents and other public men, with all their watching, not only failed to recognize as a danger, but regarded as a blessing, and enacted laws to support, defend, and protect. I allude to African slavery.

Our Revolutionary fathers, who hav received so much honor and praise for liberating the colonies from British oppression, performed a herculean work, but at the same time made several enormous mistakes, only one of which has been corrected to this day; the others remain, sources of danger that the president, with all his watching, appears never to hav seen.

When our fathers secured liberty for themselvs and their pale-faced brethren that their imaginary God did not consider worth coloring, they had no liberty to offer to the colored race whom their pious predecessors had stolen from their nativ country and sold at auction as beasts of burden; and for generations, while our rulers were, like Harrison, watching for danger, they were so blind to danger that they regarded slavery as a blessing. We hav seen the result of stealing and enslaving human beings—a bloody war, more than half a million brave men slaughtered, millions on millions of time, property, and money wasted on war, the country filled with crippled soldiers, widows, and orphans, and pauper-houses and prisons crowded with those who hav been impoverished or corrupted by the war.

We are now nursing another war engendered by another mistake which our fathers copied from the corrupted nations of the old world, and of which our president, with all his watching, appears to be entirely oblivious, but which I will point out to him in my next, if you will allow me the space.

Respectfully yours, JEREMIAH HACKER.

HAMILTON, N. Y., July 23, 1889.

Zion's Herald speaks sensibly of the Johnstown flood, which some foolish preachers called a vengeance of heaven, as follows: "To our thought the catastrophe at Johnstown falls simply into the line of natural results from natural causes. Long ago we ceased to expect that God would work a miracle to prevent a natural sequence. Indeed, one of the lessons taught with such painful effect is the fact that God does not interpose to remedy man's neglect. We do not expect such interpositions where lesser consequences are involved."

MR. EDITOR: It is refreshing and encouraging to witness such admissions as the above, coming as they do from such editors and doctors of divinity, as Zion's Herald has always been regarded as one of the "biggest guns" out, of the old orthodox style. The truthful teachings of science are too much for the superstitious to stand, and their advocates are beginning to "throw up the sponge." I noticed in the Independent Pulpit the assertion of Rev. W. S. Wellon, in complaining to Mr. Shaw, the editor, of the attacks he and others were making on the Bible, "The Bible is an anvil that has worn out many a hammer." But the pounding the Bible is now receiving tells fearfully on it, and it is fast giving way. Such hammers as science, astronomy, reason, and common sense hav already "taken the ring" out of that anvil, so long considered God's revelation to man.

This pious editor of Zion's Herald now owns up that he has long since been convinced God is not such a being as he once supposed him to be. And if this editor will own up one more thing, a thing he is doubtless convinced of, he will admit there is no such a thing or being as this Jewish Jehovah God.

What is called Christian religion has been in existence many centuries, and has been built up at great expense to its supporters, and is kept in running order by the priests of different denominations, affording them an easy time and good living, and offering nothing in return to their supporters; and as people grow wiser and see this imposition so long practiced upon them, they are becoming dissatisfied with the condition of things, and are saying they hav carried this worthless, expensiv burden long enough, and will not be fooled with it any longer.

Yes, orthodoxy is having a hard time of it at present. Unitarianism, Universalism, Spiritualism, Infidelity, as well as science, are too much for the Christian churches to stand, and as a consequence they are growing weaker every year. Their additions as new members are fewer than formerly. Protracted meetings hav ceased to procure new members, and, as the saying is, hav "run out." Moody and Sankeyism is dead. And now what next to do is a question that concerns the pious and the divines. And the multitude of prayers offered to God, and all of them for Christ's sake, don't seem to help his case. Surely the outlook for Christ's kingdom is not encouraging. CARLTON RICE.

PORTSMOUTH, O., July 7, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: As I write I am thinking how quietly our lives are passing to a close. Are we utilizing the time or is it neglected and thrown away? And here a few lines flash across my mind:

Truly speaks the proverb old,
With a meaning vast,
The mill will never grind
With the water that is past.

Here is advice for the believer in the miraculous who has his back to the light of reason, and is looking with dimmed eye on the cemetery of the barbaric dead; who gropes along and worships a cruel and unjust Jehovah; who depends solely on belief, and counts actions as naught, in preference to accomplishing much intellectually, morally, and physically each day.

In my strolls about the city I find Liberalism on the increase. There are at least twenty of the gentlemen called Infidels who are outspoken. A good many are on the quiet; that is, their mouths are closed by heartless, hypocritical employers; that is to say, they dare not speak against the flood or the rib story for fear of having their bread and butter cut short. For an employer who thus robs an honest son of toil of the expression of his honest thought I hav no respect. To put it in plain words, he is a tyrant, and such a one I hate. There is a movement on foot to hav a Freethinkers' society here. I am confident that within a year it would hav a membership of over one hundred.

Of all the preachers I ever met, Rev. Mr. Fagins, pastor of Sixth street Methodist Episcopal church, is the funniest. He is away above the general run of his class, and consequently is more liberal. Not so very long since he preached on Sunday baseball, and among other things he said this: "I would not giv a cent for a man's religion that wouldn't carry him through a game of Sunday baseball." This, in other words, means that religion is what man makes it, and that a really good man can look upon the national pastime just as the bad fellow who steals, gambles, or flimflams.

This week the Adventist elders, who are giving exhibitions under canvas, are to meet a few of the leading Freethinkers of this city. The meeting is for the purpose of discussing the prophecies, the truth of which the Adventists claim forever settles the divine origin of the Bible. The truth is, they do not know whether a prophecy was made before or after the fact. For all they know, there may be a million gods. I hav come to the conclusion that what they do not know would make a much larger book than all the Bibles of all the world. And about the mysteries of life and death they know nothing. This they know I know, and I am glad they know it. As I close the strain of "Rock-a-bye, Baby," comes floating from the next room, where my wife is rocking our baby boy to sleep, and as I listen to the lullaby, I think how nice it is to know that he who is rocked there is safe from the grasp of an orthodox God. Only a few more flames to quench, and the cruel fires of hell will hav all disappeared.

WILL S. ANDRES.

FORT FAIRFIELD, ME., July 11, 289.

MR. EDITOR: If you please, I am not yet quite done with my complimentary language with regard to this town and some of its citizens.

One of your subscribers, G. W. Giberson, sickened and died here last winter, after which a certain minister told his audience that it was worth all the effort they had made during the winter, or words to that effect, to reclaim that one poor soul from the baneful effects of Infidelity! Then my friend went and saw the widow, and learned from her that it was no such thing; that he told the minister, as he had told everyone, that he was all right; that he died as he had lived, an Infidel. So there is, I think, another Christian lie to be recorded in the next edition of Colonel Billings's "Crimes of Preachers."

Now, then, Mr. Editor, one of your Radical subscribers requests me to say to you that a certain Methodist minister delivered a harang, that I suppose is called a sermon, in a certain schoolhouse in said town, in which he berated respectable Infidels, by saying that a moral Infidel in a community was worse than a thief and a robber. He prayed God to remove their enemy from their midst by death or otherwise. He knew he was talking to a lot of Infidels and he seemed to want God to kill them off for his special benefit. Such contemptible abuse as that is worthy only of a smooth-faced Methodist minister clothed in the priestly robes of hypocrisy and deception.

If any of the theological hornets of this town want anything of me I hope they will call here at my humble abode and get their wants ministered unto. If not, I warn them to keep quiet henceforth and from this out and let respectable Infidels alone. If I hear anything more from them—and if they say anything it will be reported to me—they will hear from me again through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER. For I don't believe the Editor will show the white feather by refusing to publish my letters so long as I am bold enough to write them and sign to them my proper name, and let the world know that I am a genuin, and not a fictitious, character,

Since my late letter appeared, I hav received and read excellent copies of the Freethinkers' Magazin and Secular Thought. I hav also received and read Aunt Elmina's little book entitled, "John's Way," which is one of the nicest and richest little books I ever saw. It is written the most in Colonel Ingersoll's style of eloquence of anything I hav ever seen. If she is the author of that book she is as smart again as I thought she was, and I shall hereafter style her the "Lady Ingersoll of the South." Her little book called "Mary Jones; or, The Infidel School Teacher," is a very interesting little book, too. And I would advise every Liberal everywhere to send to her thirty-five cents and get these two nice little books.

The Infidels were terribly abused here last winter and no one seemed inclined to take it up, so now I propose to keep my pen moving until I silence their slandering tongues.

Fraternally, H. H. GILMAN.

TRINIDAD, COL., July 8, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Accident placed in my hands, a few days ago, a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and, while I hav been pleased with the general style and make-up of your interesting publication, I hav experienced more than a surprise, a supreme disgust, in reading the communications which it contains on Spiritualism. I can understand how an orthodox Christian, by which I mean a Christian who swallows, with his eyes shut, all the ridiculous fables of the Bible, can be a Spiritualist, for the Bible is made up, in great part, of stories of talking ghosts. Its authors could not even invent a Christ without giving him a ghostly origin.

In fact, if you take away from the Christian, that is, the orthodox Christian, religion, the ghostly element, there will be very little of it left. What could be more natural and consistent, then, than for a Christian to be a Spiritualist? But how any Liberal-minded Freethinker, or "Infidel," as the church people say, can be a Spiritualist, is something which exceeds my comprehension. The very foundation of skepticism, as I understand it, is, at least, a position of doubt in regard to an existence hereafter. Thomas Jefferson and Benjamin Franklin had this doubt, because they could not hav a positiv belief where there could be no proof, and this is the necessary condition of every logical, well-balanced, and scientific mind. The great objection which the skeptic has to the Christian is, that the latter undertakes to assert positivly that there is a future existence—a thing of which he can not possibly be certain. The truly philosophic position is to say, "I don't know;" but the Spiritualist, like his Christian brother, assumes to be infallible on the subject, and, no less dogmatic than the Christian, asserts most positivly that there is; for there can be no such thing as Spiritualism without a future state. From Spiritualism to Christianity is only one step, and a very short step at that. A Spiritualist calling himself a skeptic is an anomaly of the worst sort, and he should go where he properly belongs, with the believer in spooks, ghosts, and goblins; that is to say, with the orthodox Christian. Mr. O. W. Barnard, your correspondent, seems to think he settles the matter in favor of his Bible-ghost when he asks, "How are you going to account for the writing between two closed slates held in your hands?"

Here is the true Christian logic over again. You must believe in the reality of everything which you can't account for, thus entirely leaving out of account the wonderful performances of sleight-of-hand and so-called magic. Truly, Mr. Barnard has in him all the material for the making of a first-class Christian of the most approved pattern.

I would ask Mr. Barnard, in reply, how he accounts for the marvelous tricks of the magician, Hermann. I had the pleasure of witnessing, not long ago, some of the inexplicable deceptions of this marvel of magic (Hermann), and many of the things which he did, or appeared to do, were just as difficult to account for as the performance of Mr. Barnard's writing ghost; but will Mr. Barnard pretend to say that all of Mr. Hermann's illusions are realities, because he (Mr. Barnard) cannot understand them? For instance, does Mr. Barnard believe that Mr. Hermann can pull a live rabbit out of the mouth of any one in the audience? And yet, to all appearance, he does it, and I defy the closest observer to detect and explain the deception. You will hav to produce some stronger proof of the existence of ghosts, Mr. Barnard, than your little slate-writing trick, before you can convince the level-headed readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER of the reality of your ghost, for Mr. Hermann can double discount that trick any day in the week.

Either embrace the logical position of the true skeptic, Mr. Barnard, viz., that no one can assert positivly that there is a future existence, or else join the ranks of the Bible Christian, where you will be in much more congenial company.

Very respectfully, J. M. BEALL.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., June 30, 289.

MR. EDITOR: Brother Barnard, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 15th, claims to hav made a few remarks on an article of mine of May 25th. He accuses me of claiming "to hav studied very thoroughly, carefully, and critically all the laws pertaining to Spiritual philosophy, and after tracing them in all their ramifications, through the measureless depths of the universe, come to the sage conclusion that there is no spiritual life, consequently no spiritual laws or phenomena existing in all the wide realms of nature."

That is, according to Brother Barnard, I claim to hav traced the "laws" (through the measureless depths of the universe) of what I claim had no laws or existence. That I claim to hav successfully pursued a nonentity to the confines of the universe, ascertained all its laws, and finally determined that it did not exist and had no laws. If Brother Barnard can convict me of having made any such claim, I will quit writing to THE TRUTH SEEKER, apply immediately to a doctor, and hav him put my head to soak.

What I recollect saying was that I did not intend trying to prove a negativ respecting the existence of spirits, etc., the exact opposit of what he accuses me of saying.

Brother Barnard wants to know, "What would I think of the judge on the bench, or even the jury in the box, should they waive the examination and sifting of evidence . . . and thus decide without hearing the testimony?"

That is not what I hav been doing. I hav been listening to testimony for years, and hav acknowledged that it exists in abundance. But does Brother Barnard know of a court which does not ignore spiritual "phenomena?" Every experimenter in every department of science and art can get before courts and juries. They are needed there. A case cannot be made up without them. Engineers, mechanics, telegraph operators, photographers, all come before the courts every day, but no medium gets before a court unless arraigned for fraud.

In the old witchcraft times spiritual phenomena were recognized in all the courts. Learned judges decided cases on testimony relating to such phenomena. No attention was paid to probabilities or possibilities. People could be easily convicted, by unimpeachable testimony, of selling themselvs to the devil, riding through the air on a broomstick, milking a neighbor's cows by sticking an ax in a post and letting the milk run down the handle, transforming themselvs into cats, wolves, and other animals, and numerous equally probable offenses. These spiritual phenomena had to be thrown out of court not for want of testimony to establish them, but to keep the whole communities from going insane.

The laws of evidence hav been thoroughly studied during the last century. It is claimed that many eminent jurists are Spiritualists. If Spiritualists can do what they claim, they can furnish the key to every criminal case in every court. The medium can make himself as necessary to the court as the reporter. By all means let us hav Spiritualism before the courts. What will satisfy the courts under modern rules of evidence will convince every intelligent person in the country, and we who do not believe will be delighted to eat our own words.

Brother Barnard wants me to try an experiment. He tells me, if I undertake it, I must follow directions to the letter. I must procure two slates from London, Pekin, or Calcutta, and keep them in my possession until I get home. Of course I must not go to sleep on the return voyage. Next, I am to put a private mark on them, put a small piece of pencil between them, and fasten them together. Why fasten and mark them if I am going to hold them in my hands all the time? Then I am to get a friend to hunt up a medium, one to five hundred miles away, holding the slates in my hands all the time. What will hinder the friend from telling the medium all about me? He is to be a first-class medium. How can I tell a first from a second class fraud? Then I am to go to the medium at the time appointed, not letting the slates pass out of my hands during the journey, which will oblige me to procure some one to feed me, open and shut doors, etc., and I shall hav to go to bed with my coat on or get a dematerializing medium to take it off. Then I am to take a seat at the table and allow the medium to hold one end of the slates if he wants to. Then, "if everything should be all right," I shall hear the pencil writing me a message. Then I am to pay the medium and put on my hat. How am I going to do this while holding the slates in my hands? I am no prestidigitator. Then I am to go home by the nearest route, call my family and friends into a room, shut and lock the door, open the slates, show them the two blank surfaces and the bit of pencil, and explain to them that I hav been idiot enough to work hard to get money to enable me to travel over land and ocean to procure those slates, and to take them to a man I believed to be a fraud to hav him get some spirits which I did not believe to exist, to do some writing between those closed slates.

If anyone knew of a medium who could get spirits to write between closed slates, which were procured at home and kept in the hands of the person receiving the message, why hav they not told Mrs. Slenker, Miss Gibson, the Seybert commission, and others, and not let them spend time and money on a set of tricksters?

Now, Brother Barnard, I hav not the money, and cannot undertake to carry out your proposal at present. When I get ready to start I will let you know. Meanwhile you might bend a pin, tie it to a piece of wrapping-twine, drop it carefully into a rainwater barrel, and, "if everything should be all right," you will catch a whale.

D. PRIESTLEY.

EAU CLAIRE, WIS., July 20, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: J. K. Ingalls is evidently another hopeful student in the school of Anarchy (the woods are full of them, and getting fuller). Mr. Ingalls distinguishes very correctly between natural and monopolistic rent and interest. But he says he knows of no economist of note who has drawn the distinction. That is because he has not approached the subject by the way of Anarchistic literature; which again shows that all who think for themselvs get to the Anarchistic conclusions just the same. The distinction as to rent was drawn long since by Richard Jones, whose ideas John Stuart Mill adopted without giving credit. Jones showed that rent in practice is charged according to the customs prevailing under the ryot, metayer, serf, or cottier systems, and has no affinity with Ricardo's theoretical rent. The latter would in no way conflict with justice, if use were the only tenure of land (as, of course, it would be under the system of Anarchy). The quintessence of the other (which Jones calls peasant rent, while describing Ricardo's as farmer's rent) is a tenure of land not derived from use but from land, which always is opposed to justice. The whole argument of "Progress and Poverty" is an elaborate fallacy, founded on the confusion of the two. The proposal of Mr. George is liable to all the usual objections against state Socialism. But the Anarchis has no need to consider these objections. The land, he says, belongs of right to the cultivator and no one else. This simple principle need only be observed in order to bring the whole process of production and distribution into harmony with justice, so far as the distribution is not affected by exchange.

In connection with the problem of exchange, Mr. Ingalls perceives that a fluctuation in relativ values is necessary to interest. Let us look into this a little more closely. If a farmer exchanges potatoes for clothes, both the farmer and the tailor get more for less than if each tried to produce both potatoes and clothes. The profit arising from a division of labor is therefore reciprocal. Suppose the tailor, obtaining more potatoes in this way than he can eat, exchanges some of them for boots. The shoemaker may be able to giv the tailor more in boots than he would hav given the farmer, and yet get more potatoes for less boots than if he had to spend time on the street corner waiting for a farmer who wanted boots, because the tailor's shop is always right there; and the tailor, even if he does not use the boots, can trade them for something else. Thus, there is still a simple division of labor, and a reciprocal profit—the tailor's gross profit so far being divisible into the elements of wages and insurance against such losses as may ensue if he has to keep boots, clothes, or potatoes for a time in stock—which means that his net profit as shopkeeper or middleman is merely wages earned by the useful employment of his time in that capacity. But if the tailor, now become a shopkeeper, perceives that the production of boots is greater according to the demand than the production of potatoes before the shoemaker has found that out, then, by reducing his purchasing price of boots, he can gain the difference. This speculativ gain is that part of his profit which is termed interest; and its essence is to be non-reciprocal. What the farmer might gain in that way the shoemaker would lose. What the middleman does gain in that way is obtained by finding out before the producers which of them is producing more than the other will buy at the current rate. Commercial interest is determined by economic. If the tailor, become a shopkeeper, sees that the production of shoes is running ahead of the production of potatoes, he sees that he can afford to borrow money at usury for the purpose of buying potatoes, before the price of the latter rises. All cornering and speculation is but an extension of the same process. It was inevitable that during the evolution of trade this speculativ profit should assume the proportions which we see. But there is an agency at work which perpetually counteracts it. Production turns from those branches which are being prosecuted at a loss to those which can be prosecuted at a profit. If this transfer were effected by trades organizations looking only to wages, it would be gentle and harmless. But since every branch of production is monopolized by middlemen seeking that part of profit which is called interest, it involves a commercial crisis. "It is precisely these fluctuations," says Karl Marx, "though they bring the most terrible desolation in their train, and shake the fabric of bourgeois society like earthquakes, which in their course determin price by the cost of production." The monopolization of all branches of production by interest-seeking middlemen is, of course, due to their smartness. But they cannot cheat the above-stated natural law. Protectiv tariffs but narrow their field. The exploitation of new foreign markets only leaves them fewer to exploit. When one mercantil system overspreads the world, prices will be lowered to the cost of production, and interest must die. This means a revolution as great as the extinction of feudalism. Government was organized to facilitate exploitation; and it will go with exploitation. The desperate efforts which the capitalistic class are now making to beat the law of competition, e. g., the trusts, and the state Socialistic projects which are being adopted to head off Anarchy, denote, to my thinking, that the end is pretty near.

C. L. JAMES.

CRESCO, IA., July 14, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: During nearly three years I hav been carrying on a controversy with one of Jehovah's business managers. Several papers—in German—hav been exchanged. The last one sent—March, 1889—has not yet been answered. I think the supply of inspirations is exhausted, or maybe he has run out of revelations, which is not to be wondered at when the great number already furnished is taken into consideration. One of his revelations is a real stunner. He declares, or rather admits, that sin is committed in heaven as well as upon earth. This is what he had to admit in reply to my oft-repeated queries regarding the origin of the Christian devil or the creation of an angel sufficiently bad to become a devil.

Another salvation-monger, with whom I grappled last fall, claims that the Holy Queer teaches that the earth is flat at the poles. I differed, accusing him of ignorance as to the contents of the Bible or of intentionally speaking untruth. I extracted a promis from him that he would answer my questions and substantiate his assertions. Soon thereafter I submitted forty-two questions, and called for the promised reply since. Still he is mum as a corpse. He is either a coward, a deceiver, or an ignoramus.

Others of that ilk avoid discussion of points pertaining to their three-ply God or to their devil and his kitchen. They dare not invite investigation of religious history. They know it cannot stand scrutiny. They dare not risk their loaves and fishes. However obscure or inefficient my efforts may be, they are on the side of humanity, mental liberty, and equal rights, and not like their—the preachers'—efforts, always against these blessings—always an obstacle in the way of progress.

I feel like kicking myself when I remember how greedily I used to gulp down religion, how uncritically I would accept so-called proofs which under the light of reason proved to be no proofs at all.

As a sample of religious folly I will mention an incident, which might be duplicated many times. When I was about thirteen years old a neighbor offered me twenty-five cents to hunt up a steer which was lost, or strayed, in the Wisconsin woods or marshes. After about three hours' search I espied the beast. He was wild and shy as a deer and as much opposed to my company as a believer is averse to reason. Steer, myself, and my little dog had been crushing bushes and splashing swamp mud for some hours, when it occurred to me that I might fire off some prayers, with which I was loaded to the muzzle. This of course had to be done on the wing. Still, I lost time by foolishly wasting wind. My little dog, not being stuffed with superstition, attended to his business and worried the steer so that he sought refuge in a thicket, where he cornered himself in the crotch of a fallen tree. I caught up, and lo and behold! the sight that met my eyes reminded one of old Abraham's buck sheep. The steer was fast in the thicket and the tree top. My entreaty proved to be as efficient as that of the old patriarch. I was enraptured, and then and there became convinced beyond the shadow of a doubt that my prayer had been answered—that Jehovah's intervention could not be denied. It never occurred to my simple mind that the supposed reinforcement was unduly belated; that there had been no excuse for making the steer run when first discovered, and no reason why I should be driven to almost despair of success after having about exhausted my strength in a chase of many hours' duration.

Nearly a quarter of a century had elapsed when common sense and experience convinced me that, aside from personal perseverance, my little barking friend—and not himself, dog, turned end for end, G-o-d—had helped me bag the game and pocket the hard-earned quarter.

The supposition that prayers are noticed and answered by some outlandish deity has warped the minds of many, in other respects, sensible people. It has caused more downright misery than any other deadbeat scheme ever invented by designing scoundrels.

Relating to a believer my cowboy experience I was informed that then my conclusions were correct, and that now I am altogether wrong, because I refuse to acknowledge that God, and not the dog, had assisted me. And though I could not see with bare eyes the hand—why not lasso?—of Jehovah, I should at least believe that he had given me the dog for that purpose—more proof that God is not almighty if he found it necessary to employ a dog. Upon being told that the good Lord supplied us with all kinds of canines, I asked if slaveholders had been furnished bloodhounds for the special purpose of hunting down poor negroes and to tear the flesh from our bones when endeavoring to flee from the Christian institutions called rebel prisons in 1861-5. He replied that God's ways are not our ways, and are, therefore, incomprehensible to us. I telling him that I could not accept and follow a leader whose ways or notions are incomprehensible, he called me a godless creature, at the same time claiming that his God is omnipresent, and thereby admitting by implication that he (God) must be in and about me—that he must hav been in the hounds, in the pursued niggers, and in the fugitivs from the prison pen—God in a dog's hide chasing and lacerating God's temples, viz., negroes and soldiers—this is Christian logic fresh from the fountain. I think that the ever watched-over and cared-for sparrow occupied a very enviable position at that time.

During the late war the Lord caused or permitted the loss of many thousands of lives and shattered the health of other thousands. In it I lost the use of one ear, had my right hand crippled, contracted rheumatism, and lung and heart disease; in short, I am reduced to a physical wreck. For all the hardship I endured then, and for all consequent suffering since, I am advised to thank a so-called merciful God. Not much; I cannot see the benefit of physical pain.

One consolation I hav. I served three years to upset one of the all-wise God's cruel institutions, human slavery.

I am again a soldier—not of the cross, but of the flag above the cross, and the cross folks will ever find me on the skirmish line or other duty, in behalf of humanity, with ammunition dry and plenty of it. I will contribute my mite toward the achievement of a greater blessing—mental liberty—than even the emancipation from physical bondage of four million human beings.

My Christian friends tell me that my course impedes the intents or designs of their Jehovah. Now, if I am in reality a hindrance to that God's intentions and movements, do not they admit that man is more powerful than he—that man possesses more ability or determination to carry out intentions than does that so-called almighty God and the supposed creator of all in and about man? Blind belief makes them so incapable of a correct line of thought that they cannot, or perhaps will not, see that the above charge deprives their deity of claim to omnipotence.

They imply that I am guided by their devil. If such were possible I would hav cause for "joy forever," because he is really the best of all Christian myths on exhibition. The other fellow has a rather tough record, à la his authorized biography (Holy Jumble). His Satanic majesty is not even suspected of complicity in the Johnstown disaster, while the clergy are telling us that their Jehovah conducted the terrible affair.

I agree with A. D. Swan (THE TRUTH SEEKER, July 6, 1889) in all he says regarding the free circulation of Liberal tracts. Many skeptics are moral cowards who dare not openly discuss the problems involved, while they would, in seclusion, read and digest such literature, and in all probability crawl out of their holes, to show that they are not entirely devoid of some degree of manhood.

Yours for freedom to all, F. L. DAUBERSMITH.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Dream of Childhood.

Oh, fast the years are fleeting;
My youthful days are gone;
Our childish heart's fond beating
Is past the gray of dawn.
Bring back those years of pleasure,
So free from toil and care—
Those years that gave full measure,
To every joy full share.
Bring back the silver gleaming
Of childhood's hopes and fears;
Bring back the golden beaming
Of early gleeful years.

Resound those notes of laughter
That echoed through the air;
Bring back these long years after
The joys that now are rare.
Bring back the eager yearning
For river, dale, and hill,
When childish hope was burning
With joy its cup to fill.
Those springtide spells of beauty
That filled our hearts with joy
Are changed to hours of duty,
And earnest thoughts employ.

The thrill of bush and wildwood
Where youthful fancy played,
The flowery paths of childhood
That led through dells of shade,
Were changed to paths where lovers
In fondest passion dream
Of secret joy that hovers
Where love doth reign supreme.
Recall the fondest token
That early childhood earned,
The spell of years is broken,
The sweets of knowledge learned

Richland, S. Dak. Louis N. Crill, Jr.

One Day's Outing.

We thought, B. and I, that we might combine business with pleasure and enjoy a sensible outing at the same time. The night before we started on our day's journey we ate all the boiled rice that Mary was saving for breakfast fritters. In consequence, that queen of the kitchen looked grim enough in the morning, and no doubt was strongly tempted to giv us, instead of flapjacks, a piece of her mind for breakfast. However, we compromised and mollified by my making some buttermilk rolls for the morning meal. Breakfast over, we said good-bye to dogs, cats, the parrot, and Mary and I started gaily for Bowenville depot.

A pretty crowd of children with their mammas and a dozen or so of papas were awaiting the train bound for the town that contains the celebrated Dighton rock with its (maybe) Scandinavian or (maybe again and highly probable Indian) hieroglyphics which no man or woman hath yet deciphered. This company was intent on a basket picnic under the grand old trees back of the Groveland foundry. The gleeful voices, merry laughter, the shining eyes and eager, joyous, happy faces, of the children were beautiful to hear and see. Ah, how little it takes to set a child's heart bounding with joy! How little to make its face fair as a rose all wet with morning dew!

The picnickers got off the train at Dighton while we rode on to Taunton—its Indian name Cohannet. Dux femina facti—a woman was leader in the act. Like Dido, queen of Carthage, who, on landing on the coast of Africa, purchased as much land as might be covered by a bull's hide, and by cutting the hide into thin strips thus inclosed a considerable tract of country, upon which was built the historical city of Carthage, so Miss Elizabeth Poole purchased of the Indians for a peck of beans and a few trinkets all the land that now comprises the city of Taunton and the surrounding villages.

On alighting at Taunton we inquired the way to the green, the little park around which cluster the business places of the city. "Follow the horse-car track," was the laconic reply. We obeyed instructions, but instead of turning to the left we went straight on to the right. On and on we walked till very tired, but saw not the famous green. We passed many handsome residences and finally bethought us to inquire again of a laughing little lady, who bade us "turn about and go straight back a good half mile, cross the railroad track and a few steps more you are at the green." "Never mind," said B. "We hav seen the handsome houses where the wealthy nobles dwell."

At the railroad crossing we were obliged to wait till a long freight train went lumbering past. Always interested in the noble canine race, we stooped to pet a beautiful water spaniel named Rex. His owner, pleased at the notice of his animal, became communicativ. The lovely creature, he said, had nine brothers and four sisters all of one litter. From doggies he went to cats. He owned till the day before a feline of rare breed. A ferocious creature of the ordinary cat race caught his half-grown beauty, and, horrible to relate, ate one of its paws half off! He would rather hav given $50 than that this should hav occurred. But there was no redress. Cats are not considered property in law. You may steal a cat, drown a cat, hang a cat, shoot a cat, and nobody can claim damages. Cats may eat cats, chew them all up, scratch out their eyes, and otherwise maltreat them, but the law has no power to interfere. There is no such thing as cat property recognizable in law.

A nail in B.'s shoe had almost made her wild, as well as a hole in her foot, so we visited a shoeshop and had the offending instrument of torture removed.

One walking with a nail in the heel of his boot, projecting upward, can hav some idea of the terrors of the holy Inquisition. After attending to our business we walked around town, and mistook the central police station for a gentleman's residence, it was so clean and still, on the outside at least. Next door is the district court, and over the way the registry of deeds and county court house. We were quite surprised to learn by the town clock and our appetites how near it was to the dinner hour. That meal dispatched, we boarded the train and rode down to Deighton, where we called on an artist friend who livs in a mansion all alone by himself. After viewing the pictures, taking a walk in the garden, and a peep in the well, we handled the old-fashioned china in the big buttery, caressed the day-old kitten, looked at some California wine, read in the books and newspapers, and chattered pleasantly till near train time. We went to the depot by the river road and through a green lane past two dilapidated houses that were once homes, but now dismantled and uninhabited, broken, desolate, and forlorn, yet embowered with shrubbery, wildflowers, and weeds, as if nature's hand was trying to cover the ruin and decay, and efface the ravages of time and age.

At the depot a man drove up in a team with some ice-cream, unbought by the picnickers, who had gone in an earlier train.

"Would you like some cream?" I asked B.

"I never refuse cream," said she, lapping her lips.

I bargained for a quart, but, alas, there were no dishes to put it in, and no spoons to eat it with! The man was equal to the emergency.

"The depot master livs upstairs; maybe you can borrow some," he suggested.

Upstairs I went, and succeeded in borrowing two big saucers and two plated spoons.

The train came up, and "All aboard" sounded just as the last spoonful of cream disappeared. We were soon in the little village of Somerset, thence gliding across the river, down past the "Needles," into Steepbrook, and from thence to busy Bowenville and home.

B. says I havn't told half—the loafers on the green at Taunton, hanging over the railing like herrings on a stick; Major Brown failing to recognize us because we were out of our locality; how the drygoods dealer tried to sell us a gingham apron and a tablecloth; the glass of soda; the artist's home, where Thomas Coram, the English philanthropist, once lived for four years, a great, good man, who died while perfecting a scheme for the education of Indian girls; the boiled clams that were hastily hidden in the bureau drawer as we entered the old house; the great picture of the landing of the Norsemen on the banks of Taunton river, almost a thousand years ago, and the beautiful portrait of the poet H. H.; the river; the wreck of the mud-scow and the sheds on the other side of the road; the luxurious "bouncing Betseys" (wildflowers) growing along the wayside, and much more besides. But this is enough for one day's outing. S. H. W.

Schoolmaster's wife: "If your sister comes to-morrow with her children, and remains with us a few days, we shall hav to fry lots of pancakes, and we hav no eggs in the house." Schoolmaster: "And we are short of money besides. But patience; I hav an idea. (At school.) Children, to-morrow I will tell you the beautiful story of Columbus, who discovered America; so each of you will hav to bring an egg with you to school."

Curiosities in Figures.

The digit 9 is a wonderful figure. Multiply it by any figure, large or small, and the figures of the product will "add up" one or more separate 9s. Try it.

The nine digits arranged as a number thus, 123,456,789, and multiplied by 9, equals 1,111,111,101. Now it will readily be seen that multiplying by 18, 27, 36, 45, 54, etc. (all multiples of 9), is simply multiplying the number 1,111,111,101 by 2, 3, 4, 5, etc., the product being, of course, 2s, 3s, 4s, 5s, etc.

Now reverse the order of the digits, thus, 987,654,321. This multiplied by 9 is 8,888,888,889, multiplied by 18 is 17,777,777,778, multiplied by 27 is 26,666,666,667, multiplied by 36 is 35,555,555,556, multiplied by 45 is 44,444,444,445, multiplied by 54 is 53,333,333,334, multiplied by 63 is 62,222,222,223, multiplied by 72 is 71,111,111,112, multiplied by 81 is 80,000,000,001. This may also be carried on indefinitly, and it will be seen that the first and last figure (or figures) taken together is the multiplier. This article is only a hint to the many curious freaks of the figures.

Words of Wisdom.

The following maxims are by the greatest statesman that this country has yet produced—Thomas Jefferson:

Taste cannot be controled by law.

The only security for all is a free press.

Is uniformity of opinion desirable? No more than of face and stature.

An honest heart being the first blessing, a knowing head is the second.

It is error alone which needs the support of government. Truth can stand by itself.

Bigotry is the disease of ignorance, of morbid minds; enthusiasm of the free and buoyant.

Were we directed from Washington when to sow and when to reap, we should soon want bread.

Education is the only sure foundation that can be devised for the preservation of freedom and happiness.

I am not among those who fear the people. They, and not the rich, are our dependence for continued freedom.

I hav sworn upon the altar of God eternal hostility against every form of tyranny over the mind of man.

The Pig and the Cow.

A pig having fallen into a pit set up a loud squealing for help, and the cow came running to see what was the matter. In her anxiety to be of service she caved the bank in on the pig and smothered him.

"Alas!" he gasped with his dying breath, "had I called in the bear, who is my enemy, I should hav been no worse off!"

Moral: It's about an even thing whether you call the doctor or the lawyer.

Correspondence.

Pocahontas, Ill., June 9, 1889.

Dear Miss Wixon: I hav got ready to write a letter for the Corner ever so many times, but my courage failed me each time, as I never wrote for any paper before—so I will try once more. My pa has been a reader of The Truth Seeker for a long time, and ever since I hav been old enough to read and understand I hav read the Children's Corner. Two weeks ago pa, my sister, and I went to see my grandma, who lives in Marine some fifteen miles from here.

I am fifteen years old. I go to school in the winter. I study reading, writing, geography, history, orthography, and grammar. Our school is out now. We hav a graded school of three departments. I will close for this time. Hoping to see this in print, I remain, Your Liberal friend,

Cora A. Kleinman.

Shanes Crossings, O., July 21, 1889.

Dear Miss Wixon: I see my letter in The Truth Seeker, and I promised to tell my little friends how I bought my colt. I made a contract with mother to this effect: I was to hav one-third of all butter I churned, and all eggs I gathered, and weed in the garden at fifty cents per day last year. When I counted up my cash I had $64, so I only lacked $36. Well, I had a birthday, and I thought I would try the stocking racket on father, so I tied my sock very tight to the knob on father's bedroom door, and trusted the rest to mother's persuasiv power. Well, you can bet I heard every word that was said between father and mother; finally I heard the coveted $36 drop in the sock. Next morning I was off at sunrise to pay my uncle for the colt. I am working on the same terms for mother this year, and I expect to hav a team of my own, and, if any of my Liberal friends come this way, I will drive them over the country and visit all Liberals here. We hav four hundred miles free pike road in this county and are building more, and I think it would be a pleasure for some Liberal to lecture here, for there are many Freethinkers here. Wishing the Children's Corner success, I remain, Yours truly, Solomon P. King.

Never tell a secret to a young man, because "new pails leak;" never tell it to an old man, because "an old door seldom shuts tight." There is one better rule, and that is never to do anything which needs to be kept in secret.

Literary Notices.

"The Glory of Infidelity," published by Putnam & Macdonald, San Francisco, at 10 cents, is written by Samuel P. Putnam, and admirers of the sensible and feeling style of this writer will no doubt want it. Here are the concluding paragraphs:

If the time ever comes when the opinions we set forth to-day are formulated into a creed to be imposed, without questioning, on humanity, then I hope some glorious Infidel in the far future will come along and smash them to pieces. We wish the opinions we express to be forever questioned. In that way only will their real worth be forever illustrious. I always expect to be an Infidel, because I always expect to ask questions.

I rejoice in the empire that has been won by the perpetual doubts of man.

The old Roman, when he looked upon his country's magnificent conquests and majestic power, was proud indeed to say, "I am a Roman citizen." And when I look upon the empire of Infidelity, blazing along the track of human progress, revealing new continents with fresh and golden fruits, fountains of joy and hights of splendor, then indeed am I proud to say, "I am an Infidel."

The North American Review for July contains tributes to its late editor and proprietor, Allen Thorndyke Rice. They are from the pens of his intimate friends and companions, the Hon. William Waldorf Astor, the Hon. Edwards Pierrepont, Gen. William T. Sherman, and the Hon. Lloyd Bryce. The number opens with a symposium on "Disciplin in American Colleges." Adjutant-General Wolseley furnishes the second instalment of "An English View of the Civil War," wherein he indulges in severe criticism of Secretary Stanton and his attempts to direct the movements of the generals in the field, especially in connection with McClellan's command of the Army of the Potomac. Professor Richard T. Ely, of Johns Hopkins University, pleads in favor of government control of the telegraph system, contending that it would be cheaper and more satisfactory than the present method. The future of the navy is discussed by Rear-Admiral S. B. Luce. Justin McCarthy writes about "The Throne in England." While he does not think that the throne is in immediate danger, he furnishes reasons for believing that a state of things might easily be created that would result in its overthrow. Miss Kate Field portrays the prevailing ignorance of Alaska, and contends that we hav by no means realized our possibilities in that quarter of the United States. William Mathews, LL.D., writes strongly of "The Negro Intellect," which, in his opinion, supported by a considerable array of facts, is in no sense inferior to that of the Caucasian race. Gen. Charles H. T. Collis sketches some of his recent experiences in Washington, where he says he found the president and the members of the cabinet surrounded by hordes of office-seekers. "A Plague of Office-Seeking" aptly describes the situation, and the article suggests the need of a remedy. Felix L. Oswald furnishes some suggestiv "American Auguries."

A MANUAL OF INTRODUCTION TO THE NEW TESTAMENT. By Dr. Bernard Weiss, Professor of Theology in Berlin. Germany. In 2 vols., 12mo. 868 pp., cloth, $2 per volume. New York: Funk & Wagnalls.

This work forms a part of the "Foreign Biblical Library," edited by Rev. W. Robertson Nicolls, A.M. It is designed especially for ministers, theological students, teachers, and any who desire a profounder knowledge of the New Testament scriptures, and are willing to do some critical reading to attain that end. Of course Freethinkers will find in it much which they must reject, if they hav read Rationalistic works on the same subject. But it may be of use to some of them to read the other side in connection with their own; and this book seems to be as good a one for this purpose as can be got, being comparativly fair and candid. In the first volume Dr. Weiss discusses what he calls the "Science of Introduction," from patristic times to the present. He then devotes over a hundred pages to a critical and detailed "History of the New Testament Canon." This is followed by a still more elaborate "History of the Pauline Epistles." The second volume, just issued, is now before us. It opens with an analysis of the epistle to the Hebrews, and treats at some length the question of its authorship. This epistle has been variously ascribed to Paul, Apollos, Luke, Philo, Clement, and Barnabas. Dr. Weiss thinks that Paul was not its author, as is commonly supposed. In his judgment the strongest reasons point to Barnabas as the writer of this book. Next follows an examination of the Revelation of John, the Brethren of Jesus, and the general epistles of James, Jude, Peter, and John. Two hundred pages are then devoted to the historical books of the New Testament, taking them up separately and interweaving many facts of interest. The volume closes with an appendix giving a "History of the New Testament Text," involving its original language, its early manuscripts, its various versions, and its preservation.

FUNDAMENTAL PROBLEMS: The Method of Philosophy as a Systematic Arrangement of Knowledge. By Dr. Paul Carus. Chicago: The Open Court Co. Price, $1.

The philosophy which the "Fundamental Problems" presents is Monism. Monism holds that all existence is one. It sets forth a unitary conception of the world; a conception which is the natural outcome of the processes by which in general we acquire knowledge. For it lies in the disposition of the human mind to seek a unification of all that comes within its range. Thus the foundation of Monism rests upon, and is original in, the formal constitution of the human intellect. It seeks nothing beyond nor beneath, but "attempts to understand all the single phenomena of the universe, as well as the whole of reality, by one universal law or from one all-embracing principle." The author, as indicated by the tenor of the title and motto, objects to supernaturalism as well as Agnosticism. The method of his philosophy is a systematic arrangement of knowledge. Knowledge is the possession of certain truths; truth, the conformity of cognition to reality; and reality the sum total of all that is. So that the conception in which this system culminates is positiv and based upon the data of reality. The vital questions of philosophy and of ethics are discussed as they find elucidation from the principles of this system; among them are the problems of: Formal Thought (Kant's Apriori); Causality; The Origin of Life; Absolute Existence; Space and Time; Infinitude and Eternity; Free Will; Ethics and Natural Science; The Importance of Art.

PIONEER PITH: The Gist of Lectures on Rationalism. By Robt. C. Adams. New York: The Truth Seeker Company. 99pp.; 25 cents.

"What men want nowadays is pith," says Mr. Robert C. Adams; "condensed thought is in demand." We quite agree with him. The author who, like Madam Blavatsky, writes a book of sixteen hundred pages deserves to be neglected however transcendent his or her merit. "The pioneer pith of Rationalism" consists, according to our transatlantic friend, in "the fact that the universe is controled by natural laws, and develops by uninterrupted successions of cause and effect; no arbitrary supernatural will ever interferes." Mr. Adams sets out with a concise statement of the principles of evolution, and then, in a plain, easy, matter-of-fact manner, summarizes, in a series of short chapters, the leading arguments of Rationalism versus Christianity. His book is a bird's-eye view of the case for skepticism, drawn with a clear, bold outline. He makes no strain after fine writing or sounding periods. He is full of common sense, and you can understand every word he says. Once indeed he plunges into verse, with the most dismal result:

> Jehovah ranks with Jupiter,
> The Bible's Hebrew literature;

etc. We hav nothing to say against Jehovah ranking with Jupiter, but we do protest against making "Jupiter" rhyme with "literature." While we are finding fault, we may also venture to suggest that Mr. Adams is somewhat hasty in classing Ireland along with Spain and Italy as "the most devout, the most ignorant, and the most criminal among modern nations." Our Celtic neighbors deserve kinder words. Notwithstanding these little blemishes, there is very much excellent matter, dealing with the History of Religion, Hebrew Mythology, the Pagan Origin of Christianity, Modern Criticism of the Bible, Prophecy, the Resurrection, Theism and Atheism, Morality, Sabbath Observance, etc. From an interesting section on "What Hav Unbelievers Done for the World?" we borrow an amusing illustration: "Anesthetics were opposed as impious, but the objection was answered on Bible grounds by Sir James Young Simpson, who called attention to the story of the first surgical operation. Before Jehovah took the rib out of Adam he caused a deep sleep to fall on him." Pioneer Adams has neatly extracted the pith of Rationalism, and placed Freethinkers under a debt of obligation to him.—F. James in Watts's Literary Guide.

THE ANCIENT LOWLY. A History of the Ancient Working People from the earliest known period to the adoption of Christianity by Constantine. By C. Osborne Ward, translator and librarian United States department of labor. Washington, D. C. Pages, 519. Price, $2.

Those who are interested in the labor problem will find this an invaluable work. Once our only histories were histories of the debauched lives and famous battles of kings. Then it began to be perceived that this was merely the froth and scum of history. It began to be perceived that the true history of a nation must consist of the account of the masses of the people constituting it; that it was their way of living, state of information, and nature and condition generally, that made the nation what it was, or changed it to what it was to be. Then we commenced to hav what are called Histories of the People. But still we hav not had till now a special history of that most numerous of all classes, the laboring class. The information on this class in all ages and countries that is collected and given us in one connected narration in this book, has the effect of a revelation.

In this book every one of the ancient nations is considered; the life, religion, feelings, and struggles of the laboring classes are exhibited, and the dry mentions of this or that war that constitute the bulk of ordinary histories are supplanted by a presentation of the inner nature and secret, moving causes of those wars that makes antiquity really alive for us and givs us a view vivid and realizing. The author is a man of extensiv learning, familiar with the ancient languages, and seems to hav ransacked all the libraries in the world for material. Twenty years is the time he mentions as devoted by him to preparing his work. Perhaps the best way of conveying an idea of the character of the book will be to reprint the table of contents of three or four out of its twenty-three chapters:

CHAPTER I.—Grievances of the Working Classes—The Competitiv System among the Ancients—Growing Change of Taste in Readers of History—Inscriptions and suppressed Fragments more recently becoming Incentivs to reflecting Readers who seek Them as a means to secure Facts—No true Democracy—No primeval Middle Class known to the Aryan Family—The Taint of Labor an Inheritance through the Pagan Religio-Political Economy.

CHAPTER II.—Religion and Politics of the Indo-Europeans Identical—Reason for Religion mixing with the Movements of Labor—The Father the Original Slaveholder—His Children the Original Slaves—Both Law and Religion empowered him to kill them—Work of Conscience in the Labor Problem.

CHAPTER III.—Prototypes of Industrial Life to be found in the Aryan and Semitic Branches—Era of Slavery—Dawn of Manumission—Patriarchal Form too advanced a Type of Government possible to primitiv Man—Religious Superstition fatal to Independent Labor—Labor, Government, and Religion indissolubly mixed—Concupiscence, Acquisitivness, and Irascibility a Consequence of the archaic Bully or Boss, with unlimited Powers—Right of the ancient Father to enslave, sell, torture, or kill his Children—Abundant Proofs quoted—Origin of the greater and more humane Impulses—Sympathy beyond mere Self-preservation, the Result of Education—Education originated from Discussion—Discussion the Result of Grievances against the Outcast Work-people—Too Rapid Increase of their Numbers notwithstanding the Sufferings—Means Organized by Owners for decimating them by Murder—Ample proof—The great Amphyctyonic League—Glimpses of a once sullen Combination of the Desperate Slaves—Incipient Organization of the Nobles.

CHAPTER IV.—Working People destitute of Souls—Original popular Beliefs—Plato finally gives them half a Soul—Modern Ignorance on the true Causes of certain Developments in History—Sympathy, the Third Great Emotion developed out of growing Reason, through mutual Commiseration of the Outcasts—A new Cult—The Unsolved Problem of the great Eleusinian Mysteries—Their wonderful story—Grievances of slighted Workingmen—Organization impossible to Slaves except in their Strikes and Rebellions—The Aristocrats' Politics and Religion barred the Doors against Work-people—Extraordinary Whims and Antics at the Eleusinian Mysteries—The Causes of Grievances endured by the Castaway Laborers—Their Motivs for Secret Organization—The Terrible Cryptia—The horrible Murders of Workingmen for Sport—Dark Deeds Unveiled—Story of the Massacre of two thousand Workingmen—Evidence—The Grievances in Sparta—In Athens—Free Outcast Builders, Sculptors, Teachers, Priests, Dancers, Musicians, Artisans, Diggers, all more or less Organized—Return to the Eleusinian Mysteries—Conclusion.

The other chapters are equally crowded with facts of importance in considering the labor question, and the book will help immeasurably in forming a broad view of the economical problems which are now up for consideration and solution.

Gems of Thought.

THIS is the secret of religion's success. She supports the throne, and the throne supports her.—Robert Dale Owen.

HABITS of reverence, if carried into religion, cause superstition; if carried into politics, cause despotism.—Buckle's History of Civilization.

OUR fathers said: "We will form a secular government." . . . They knew all about the hypocrisy of the olden time. They knew the church had stood side by side with the throne; that the high priests were hypocrits, and that the kings were robbers.—Ingersoll.

IT was in the year 1822 that the clergy of Austria persuaded the monarch over forty millions of people to say: "I want no men of science; I want only obedient subjects. I want no education among my subjects but what is given by the priesthood."—Dr. Thos. Cooper.

QUESTION: I would wish to know the first impudent man who presumed to make use of the authority of God. ANSWER: I take him to hav been a composition of fanaticism and knavery. Fraud alone was not sufficient. Fraud deceives, but fanaticism subjugates. It is probable, says one of my friends, that this business began by dreams. A man of a heated imagination dreams he sees his father and mother dying, they are both old and infirm, and consequently die; the dream is accomplished, and thus he becomes persuaded that God has spoken to him in a dream. If he be but audacious and crafty, which are no uncommon qualifications, he sets about predicting in the name of God. He observes, that in war, his countrymen are six to one, and foretells their success on condition of sharing a tenth of the booty. This is an advantageous business; one quack therefore educates others who hav the same interests as himself. Their authority increases with their number. God reveals to them that the best pieces of mutton and beef, the fattest poultry, and the first running of the wine belongs to them. The priests eat roast beef, and the people starve. The king of the country immediately makes a bargain with them, in order to be better obeyed by the people; but the monarch is soon the dupe of the treaty: the quacks use the power the monarch has given them over the rabble to enslave himself. The monarch kicks, and the priests depose him in the name of God. Samuel dethrones Saul, Gregory VII. dethrones the emperor Henry IV. and deprives him of the right of sepulture. This diabolico-theocratico system endures till princes arise who are sufficiently enlightened, and hav wit and courage enough, to cut the nails of the Samuels and the Gregories. Such it seems to me is the history of mankind.—Voltaire.

SOVEREIGNS, it is true, call themselvs the representativs of God, his vicegerents upon earth. But does the fear of a master, more powerful than they are, incline them seriously to study the welfare of the nations whom providence has intrusted to their care? Does the pretended terror, which ought to be inspired in them by the idea of an invisible judge, to whom alone they acknowledge themselvs accountable for their actions, render them more equitable, more compassionate, more sparing of the blood and treasure of their subjects, more temperate in their pleasures, more attentiv to their duties? In fine, does this God, by whose authority kings reign, deter them from inflicting a thousand evils upon the people to whom they ought to act as guides, protectors, and fathers? Alas! If we survey the whole earth, we shall see men almost everywhere governed by tyrants, who use religion merely as an instrument to render more stupid the slaves, whom they overwhelm under the weight of their vices, or whom they sacrifice without mercy to their extravagances.—D'Holbach.

WEAK minds hav a vast opinion of the knowledge of those who pretend to be familiar with truths that appear mysterious.—The Beacon.

So far as science or a rational conception of things is concerned, the fathers of the church, and the framers of our popular theology, were mere children. Considerations were all-powerful with them which, to-day, would not hav a feather's weight with a man of ordinary intelligence. Children readily, even eagerly, believe almost any impossible thing you may tell them about nature. As yet they hav no insight into the course of nature, or of the law of cause and effect, no fund of experience to serve as a touchstone to the false or impossible. The same was true of the fathers, and of the races that witnessed the advent of Christianity . . . mere children so far as the development of their scientific faculties was concerned.—John Burroughs.

THE introduction of one new culture is worth more to a nation than all the victories of the most splendid battles of their history.—Thomas Jefferson.

NEARLY all people stand in great horror of annihilation, and yet to giv up your individuality is to annihilate yourself.—Ingersoll.

SOME papers do not like the English habit of omitting the article "the" before the names of yachts, especially in the case of yachts named after women. CHRISTIAN CONSOLATION.

How seldom do our dreams come true!
The very thing our fancy lets
Us hope in time will be our own
Some other fellow always gets.

We fall in love; the mind's diseased,
The brain is in a foolish whirl;
And while we worship from afar
Some other fellow gets the girl.

Ah! what a torment life would be
If we were of the hope bereft
That in some fairer world than this
That other fellow would get left!

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 16. No. 32. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY. { New York, Saturday, August 10, 1889. } 28 LAFAYETTE PL. } $3.00 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

THE late Richard H. Dana used to tell this little story. He was passing a negro church at the north end of Boston one night and took it into his head to look in. After a few moments' observation and listening he was quietly retiring, when one of the official members stepped up and expressed regret that they could not offer him more attractiv preaching. Mr. Dana remarked politely that it was very good—having, in fact, seen nothing particularly amiss. But the colored brother insisted on apologizing: "Not much in de way ob preachin', sir—only a New York man!"

ONE of the most notable features of the Prussian government is the economy in the administration of all its departments. Everywhere there is found the most remarkable efficiency of service along with the most extraordinary frugality of means. Even to high officers the salaries are small, while the lower class of functionaries receive pay that would be considered ridiculous in this country.

A DISPATCH from Biddeford, Me., reads: "Rev. Father Harrington, assistant pastor of St. Mary's church, was arraigned July 29th, charged with assault and battery. Daniel Shackrow, a parishioner, attended early mass yesterday without paying ten cents, which fee the bishop recently ordered to be collected at that service to liquidate the debt on the parsonage. Shackrow tried to crowd the pastor, who was collecting the fee, and was ejected."

CHRISTIAN countries would better let alone the other lands under other religions that get along much better without them. A report from India reads: "The proof is overwhelming that the temperate Hindoos are gradually becoming a nation of drunkards. Roadside grog shops are multiplying. In one district in Bengal the government distillery used to turn out five hundred gallons a day. Now, under the new out still system, the average is one thousand five hundred gallons a day, or three times the former amount."

IN Chicago the church property of the Catholics is vastly more valuable than that of all other Christian beliefs put together, for out of the total valuation of $9,690,000, considerably over $5,000,000 worth is owned by Catholics. The statement is not surprising when one remembers that four hundred and fifty thousand people—over half the city's present population—are of this denomination. A large revenue goes into the Catholic church from parochial schools, the parents, if able, paying for their children's tuition. This revenue is largely invested in missions and orphanages. Catholic parochial schools in Chicago are attended by about forty-three thousand children, which is over half the school population of the city. From this and other sources the Catholic church income is said to aggregate about $1,000,000. Chicago's assessed wealth is about $161,000,000, and she has nearly $10,000,000 invested in places of worship. This is about eight per cent of her wealth; consequently, upon the scriptural reckoning that Christians should giv one-tenth of all they possess as tithes to the church, this city falls only slightly short of doing her full duty. If Christianity were a matter of dollars and giving, this city would overflow with saints. As it is, money is expected to purchase absolution for the depravity for which the Chicagoan is generally noted.—Chicago Times.

PROFESSOR ROMANES has been making some interesting observations on a very intelligent female chimpanzee which has been for six years in the menagerie of the Zoological Society in London. This ape is able to understand the significance of spoken language to a remarkable extent, though her attempts at vocal response consist only of three different grunting noises, one of which she employs to show assent, one for dissent, and one to express recognition of favors. She has been taught to pick up from the bottom of her cage and deliver to her instructor any number of straws which may be demanded up to five. In counting these small numbers she rarely makes a mistake; but efforts to teach her to count up to ten hav been less successful. She is usually accurate in handing out six or seven straws, but as the numbers run up to eight or nine or ten she becomes more and more uncertain. It is evident, however, that she understands these sounds to signify numbers larger than those below them, for when asked for them she always givs some quantity greater than six and less than eleven.

HOW THE OLD SCHEME WORKS.—Obtaining money by false pretenses.

IN two test cases the New Hampshire supreme court has decided that the law requiring licenses for the practice of medicin and dentistry is unconstitutional.

THE London Christian World says a special commissioner who was sent over from Japan to report upon the condition of England under Christianity made a feature in his report of the amount of drunkenness he saw, and recommended the Japanese not to adopt the English religion.

LET the national legislature once perform an act which involves the decision of a religious controversy, and it will hav passed its legitimate bounds. The precedent will then be established and the foundation laid for that usurpation of the divine prerogativ in this country which has been the dissolving scourge of the fairest portions of the Old World.—United States Senate Report, 1829.

A SCIENTIST of this city says: We are now operating in the domain of chemistry to procure various articles of food from inorganic substances, and a substitute for sugar, known as bensoic sulphinide, is now attracting the notice of chemists. Its sweetness is three hundred times that of sugar, and it is a purely inorganic compound. The discoveries of modern chemistry will hereafter be utilized more than they hav yet been in the way of providing food for mankind.

THE empress of Germany says that she wears generally during the morning a white apron; that her husband likes to see her in it and says it is a sign she looks after the children and the cook and does not meddle in public affairs or attempt to pose as intellectual. William's principal cause of dislike of his mother was that she was a woman of brains and ambition, a student and an artist and his father's chief confidant and adviser. The theory of this highly Christian emperor is that a wife has no duties and should hav no desires but to bring forth and care for his children.

From the Nineteenth Century.

I hav been careful to explain that the arguments which I hav used in the course of this discussion are not new; that they are historical and hav nothing to do with what is commonly called science; and that they are all, to the best of my belief, to be found in the works of theologians of repute.

The position which I hav taken up, that the evidence in favor of such miracles as those recorded by Eginhard, and consequently of medieval demonology, is quite as good as that in favor of such miracles as the Gadarene, and consequently of Nazarene demonology, is none of my discovery. Its strength was, wittingly or unwittingly, suggested, a century and a half ago, by a theological scholar of eminence; and it has been, if not exactly occupied, yet so fortified with bastions and redoubts by a living ecclesiastical Vauban, that, in my judgment, it has been rendered impregnable. In the early part of the last century, the ecclesiastical mind in this country was much exercised by the question, not exactly of miracles, the occurrence of which in biblical times was axiomatic, but by the problem, When did miracles cease? Anglican divines were quite sure that no miracles had happened in their day, nor for some time past; they were equally sure that they happened sixteen or seventeen centuries earlier. And it was a vital question for them to determin at what point of time, between this terminus a quo and that terminus ad quem, miracles came to an end.

The Anglicans and the Romanists agreed in the assumption that the possession of the gift of miracle-working was prima facie evidence of the soundness of the faith of the miracle workers. The supposition that miraculous powers might be wielded by heretics (though it might be supported by high authority) led to consequences too frightful to be entertained by people who were busied in building their dogmatic house on the sands of early church history. If, as the Romanists maintained, an unbroken series of genuin miracles adorned the records of their church, throughout the whole of its existence, no Anglican could lightly venture to accuse them of doctrinal corruption. Hence, the Anglicans, who indulged in such accusation, were bound to prove the modern, the medieval Roman, and the latter patristic miracles false; and to shut off the wonder-working power from the church at the exact point of time when Anglican doctrins ceased and Roman doctrin began. With a little adjustment—a squeeze here and a pull there—the Christianity of the first three or four centuries might be made to fit, or seem to fit, pretty well into the Anglican scheme. So the miracles, from Justin say to Jerome, might be recognized; while, in later times, the church having become "corrupt"—that is to say, having pursued one and the same line of development further than was pleasing to Anglicans—its alleged miracles must needs be shams and impostures.

Under these circumstances, it may be imagined that the establishment of a scientific frontier, between the earlier realm of supposed fact and the later of asserted delusion, had its difficulties; and torrents of theological special pleading about the subject flowed from clerical pens; until that learned and acute Anglican divine, Conyers Middleton, in his "Free Inquiry," tore the sophistical web they had laboriously woven to pieces, and demonstrated that the miracles of the patristic age, early and late, must stand or fall together, inasmuch as the evidence for the later is just as good as the evidence for the earlier wonders. If the one set are certified by contemporaneous witnesses of high repute, so are the other; and, in point of probability, there is not a pin to choose between the two. That is the solid and irrefragable result of Middleton's contribution to the subject. But the Free Inquirer's freedom has its limits; and he draws a sharp line of demarkation between the patristic and the New Testament miracles—on the professed ground that the accounts of the latter, being inspired, are out of the reach of criticism.

A century later, the question was taken up by another divine, Middleton's equal in learning and acuteness, and far his superior in subtlety and dialectic skill; who, though an Anglican, scorned the name of Protestant; and, while yet a churchman, made it his business to parade, with infinit skill, the utter hollowness of the arguments of those of his brother churchmen who dreamed that they could be both Anglicans and Protestants. The argument of the "Essay on the Miracles recorded in the Ecclesiastical History of the Early Ages,"* by the present Roman cardinal, but then Anglican doctor, John Henry Newman, is compendiously stated by himself in the following passage:

> If the miracles of church history cannot be defended by the arguments of Leslie, Lyttleton, Paley, or Douglas, how many of the scripture miracles satisfy their conditions? (p. cvii).

And, although the answer is not given in so many words, little doubt is left on the mind of the reader that in the mind of the writer it is: None. In fact, this conclusion is one which cannot be resisted, if the argument in favor of the scripture miracles is based upon that which laymen, whether lawyers, or men of science, or historians, or ordinary men of affairs, call evidence. But there is something really impressiv in the magnificent contempt with which, at times, Dr. Newman sweeps aside alike those who offer and those who demand such evidence.

> Some Infidel authors advise us to accept no miracles which would not hav a verdict in their favor in a court of justice; that is, they employ against scripture a weapon which Protestants would confine to attacks upon the church, as if moral and religious questions required legal proofs, and evidence were the test of truth* (p. cvii).

"As if evidence were the test of truth"— although the truth in question is the occurrence or non-occurrence of certain phenomena at a certain time and in a certain place. This sudden revelation of the great gulf fixed between the ecclesiastical and the scientific mind is enough to take away the breath of anyone unfamiliar with the clerical organon. As if, one may retort, the assumption that miracles may, or hav, served a moral or a religious end in any way alters the fact that they profess to be historical events, things that actually happened; and, as such, must needs be exactly those subjects about which evidence is appropriate and legal proofs (which are such merely because they afford adequate evidence) may be justly demanded. The Gadarene miracle either happened, or it did not. Whether the Gadarene "question" is moral or religious, or not, has nothing to do with the fact that it is a purely historical question whether the demons said what they are declared to hav said, and the devil-possessed pigs did or did not rush over the cliffs of the Lake of Gennesareth on a certain day of a certain year, after A.D. 26 and before A.D. 36; for, vague and uncertain as New Testament chronology is, I suppose it may be assumed that the event in question, if it happened at all, took place during the procuratorship of Pilate. If that is not a matter about which evidence ought to be required, and not only legal but strict scientific proof demanded by sane men who are asked to believe the story—what is? Is a reasonable being to be seriously asked to credit statements which, to put the case gently, are not exactly probable, and on the acceptance or rejection of which his whole view of life may depend, without asking for as much "legal" proof as would send an alleged pickpocket to jail, or as would suffice to prove the validity of a disputed will?

"Infidel authors" (if, as I am assured, I may answer for them) will decline to waste time on mere darkenings of counsel of this sort; but to those Anglicans who accept his premises, Dr. Newman is a truly formidable antagonist. What, indeed, are they to reply when he puts the very pertinent question:

> Whether persons who, not merely question, but prejudge the ecclesiastical miracles on the ground of their want of resemblance, whatever that be, to those contained in scripture—as if the almighty could not do in the Christian church what he had not already done at the time of its foundation, or under the Mosaic covenant—whether such reasoners are not siding with the skeptic,

And,

> Whether it is not a happy inconsistency by which they continue to believe the scriptures while they reject the church (p. liii).†

Again, I invite Anglican orthodoxy to consider this passage:

> The narrativ of the combats of St. Anthony with evil spirits is a development rather than a contradiction of revelation, viz., of such texts as speak of Satan being cast out by prayer and fasting. To be shocked, then, at the miracles of ecclesiastical history, or to ridicule them for their strangeness, is no part of a scriptural philosophy (pp. liii, liv).

Further on, Dr. Newman declares that it has been admitted,

> That a distinct line can be drawn in point of character and circumstance between the miracles of scripture and of church history; but this is by no means the case (p. lv). . . . Specimens are not wanting in the history of the church of miracles as awful in their character and as momentous in their effects as those which are recorded in scripture. The fire interrupting the rebuilding of the Jewish temple, and the death of Arius, are instances in ecclesiastical history of such solemn events. On the other hand, difficult instances in the scripture history are such as these: the serpent in Eden, the ark, Jacob's vision for the multiplication of his cattle, the speaking of Balaam's ass, the ax swimming at Elisha's word, the miracle on the swine, and various instances of prayers or prophecies, in which, as in that of Noah's blessing and curse, words which seem the result of private feeling are expressly or virtually ascribed to a divine suggestion (p. lvi).

Who is to gainsay our ecclesiastical authority here? "Infidel authors" might be accused of a wish to ridicule the scripture miracles by putting them on a level with the remarkable story about the fire which stopped the rebuilding of the temple, or that about the death of Arius—but Dr. Newman is above suspicion. The pity is that his list of what he delicately terms "difficult" instances is so short. Why omit the manufacture of Eve out of Adam's rib, on the strict historical accuracy of which the chief argument of the defenders of an iniquitous portion of our present marriage law depends? Why leave out the account of the "Bene Elohim" and their gallantries, on which a large part of the worst practices of the medieval inquisitors into witchcraft was based? Why forget the angel who wrestled with Jacob, and, as the account suggests, somewhat overstepped the bounds of fair play at the end of the struggle? Surely we must agree with Dr. Newman that, if all these camels hav gone down, it savors of affectation to strain at such gnats as the sudden ailment of Arius in the midst of his deadly, if prayerful,* enemies; and the fiery explosion which stopped the Julian building operations. Though the words of the "Conclusion" of the "Essay on Miracles" may, perhaps, be quoted against me, I may express my satisfaction at finding myself in substantial accordance with a theologian above all suspicion of heterodoxy. With all my heart I can declare my belief that there is just as good reason for believing in the miraculous slaying of the man who fell short of the Athanasian power of affirming contradictories, with respect to the nature of the godhead, as there is for believing in the stories of the serpent and the ark told in Genesis, the speaking of Balaam's ass in Numbers, or the floating of the ax, at Elisha's order, in the second book of Kings.

It is one of the peculiarities of a really sound argument that it is susceptible of the fullest development; and that it sometimes leads to conclusions unexpected by those who employ it. To my mind it is impossible to refuse to follow Dr. Newman when he extends his reasoning from the miracles of the patristic and medieval ages backward in time as far as miracles are recorded. But, if the rules of logic are valid, I feel compelled to extend the argument forward to the alleged Roman miracles of the present day, which Dr. Newman might not hav admitted, but which Cardinal Newman may hardly reject. Beyond question, there is as good, or perhaps better, evidence for the miracles worked by our Lady of Lourdes, as there is for the floating of Elisha's ax or the speaking of Balaam's ass. But we must go still further; there is a modern system of thaumaturgy and demonology which is just as well certified as the ancient.† Veracious, excellent, sometimes learned and acute persons, even philosophers of no mean pretension, testify to the "levitation" of bodies much heavier than Elisha's ax; to the existence of "spirits" who, to the mere tactil sense, hav been indistinguishable from flesh and blood, and occasionally hav wrestled with all the vigor of Jacob's opponent; yet, further, to the speech, in the language of raps, of spiritual beings, whose discourses, in point of coherence and value, are far inferior to that of Balaam's humble but sagacious steed. I hav not the smallest doubt that, if these were persecuting times, there is many a worthy "Spiritualist" who would cheerfully go to the stake in support of his pneumatological faith, and furnish evidence, after Paley's own heart, in proof of the truth of his doctrins. Not a few modern divines, doubtless struck by the impossibility of refusing the Spiritualist evidence, if the ecclesiastical evidence is accepted, and deprived of any a priori objection by their implicit belief in Christian demonology, show themselvs ready to take poor Sludge seriously, and to believe that he is possessed by other devils than those of need, greed, and vainglory.

*I quote the first edition (1843). A second edition appeared in 1870. Tract 85 of the "Tracts for the Times" should be read with this "Essay." If I were called upon to compile a primer of "Infidelity," I think I should save myself trouble by making a selection from these works, and from the "Essay on Development" by the same author.

*Yet, when it suits his purpose, as in the introduction to the "Essay on Development," Dr. Newman can demand strict evidence in religious questions as sharply as any "Infidel author;" and he can even profess to yield to its force (Essays on Miracles, 1870, note, p. 391).

† Compare Tract 85, p. 110: "I am persuaded that were men but consistent who oppose the church doctrins as being unscriptural, they would vindicate the Jews for rejecting the gospel."

* According to Dr. Newman, "This prayer [that of Bishop Alexander, who begged God to 'take Arius away'] is said to hav been offered about 3 P.M. on the Saturday; that same evening Arius was in the great square of Constantine, when he was suddenly seized with indisposition" (p. clxx). The "Infidel" Gibbon seems to hav dared to suggest that "an option between poison and miracle" is presented by this case; and it must be admitted, that if the bishop had been within reach of a modern police magistrate, things might hav gone hardly with him. Modern "Infidels," possessed of a slight knowledge of chemistry, are not unlikely, with no less audacity, to suggest an "option between fire-damp and miracle" in seeking for the cause of the fiery outburst at Jerusalem.

† A writer in a Spiritualist journal takes me roundly to task for venturing to doubt the historical and literal truth of the Gadarene story. The following passage in his letter is worth quotation: "Now, to the materialistic and scientific mind, to the uninitiated in spiritual verities, certainly this story of the Gadarene or Gergesene swine presents insurmountable difficulties; it seems grotesque and nonsensical. To the experienced, trained, and cultivated Spiritualist this miracle is, as I am prepared to show, one of the most instructiv, the most profoundly useful, and the most beneficent which Jesus ever wrought in the whole course of his pilgrimage of redemption on earth." Just so. And the first page of this same journal presents the following advertisment, among others of the same kidney:

"To Wealthy Spiritualists.—A lady medium of tried power wishes to meet with an elderly gentleman who would be willing to giv her a comfortable home and maintenance in exchange for her Spiritualistic services, as her guides consider her health is too delicate for public sittings: London preferred.—Address 'Mary,' office of 'Light.'"

Are we going back to the days of the Judges, when wealthy Micah set up his private ephod, teraphim, and Levite?

Under these circumstances, it was to be expected, though it is none the less interesting to note the fact, that the arguments of the latest school of "Spiritualists" present a wonderful family likeness to those which adorn the subtle disquisitions of the advocate of ecclesiastical miracles of forty years ago. It is unfortunate for the "Spiritualists" that, over and over again, celebrated and trusted media, who really, in some respects, call to mind the Montanist* and gnostic seers of the second century, are either proved in courts of law to be fraudulent impostors; or, in sheer weariness, as it would seem, of the honest dupes who swear by them, spontaneously confess their long-continued iniquities, as the Fox women did the other day in New York.† But whenever a catastrophe of this kind takes place, the believers are nowise dismayed by it. They freely admit that not only the media, but the spirits whom they summon, are sadly apt to lose sight of the elementary principles of right and wrong; and they triumphantly ask: How does the occurrence of occasional impostures disprove the genuin manifestations (that is to say, all those which hav not yet been proved to be impostures or delusions)? And, in this, they unconsciously plagiarize from the churchman, who just as freely admits that many ecclesiastical miracles may hav been forged; and asks, with the same calm contempt, not only of legal proofs, but of common sense probability, Why does it follow that none are to be supposed genuin? I must say, however, that the Spiritualists, so far as I know, do not venture to outrage right reason so boldly as the ecclesiastics. They do not sneer at "evidence;" nor repudiate the requirements of legal proofs. In fact, there can be no doubt that the Spiritualists produce better evidence for their manifestations than can be shown either for the miraculous death of Arius, or for the invention of the cross.‡

From the "levitation" of the ax at one end of a period of near three thousand years to the "levitation" of Sludge & Co. at the other end, there is a complete continuity of the miraculous with every gradation from the childish to the stupendous, from the gratification of a caprice to the illustration of sublime truth. There is no drawing a line in the series that might be set out of plausibly attested cases of spiritual intervention. If one is true, all may be true; if one is false, all may be false.

This is, to my mind, the inevitable result of that method of reasoning which is applied to the confutation of Protestantism, with so much success, by one of the acutest and subtlest disputants who hav ever championed ecclesiasticism—and one cannot put his claims to acuteness and subtlety higher.

> . . . the Christianity of history is not Protestantism. If ever there were a safe truth it is this. . . . "To be deep in history is to cease to be a Protestant."§

I hav not a shadow of doubt that these anti-Protestant epigrams are profoundly true. But I hav as little that, in the same sense, the "Christianity of history is not" Romanism; and that to be deeper in history is to cease to be a Romanist. The reasons which compel my doubts about the compatibility of the Roman doctrin, or any other form of Catholicism, with history, arise out of exactly the same line of argument as that adopted by Dr. Newman in the famous essay which I hav just cited. If, with one hand, Dr. Newman has destroyed Protestantism, he has annihilated Romanism with the other; and the total result of his ambidextral efforts is to shake Christianity to its foundations. Nor was anyone better aware that this must be the inevitable result of his arguments—if the world should refuse to accept Roman doctrins and Roman miracles—than the writer of "Tract 85."

Dr. Newman made his choice and passed over to the Roman church half a century ago. Some of those who were essentially in harmony with his views preceded, and many followed him. But many remained; and, as the quondam Puseyite and present Ritualistic party, they are continuing that work of sapping and mining the Protestantism of the Anglican church which he and his friends so ably commenced. At the present time, they hav no little claim to be considered victorious all along the line. I am old enough to recollect the small beginnings of the Tractarian party; and I am amazed when I consider the present position of their heirs. Their little leaven has leavened, if not the whole, yet a very large, lump of the Anglican church; which is now pretty much of a preparatory school for papistry. So that it really behooves Englishmen (who, as I hav been informed by high authority, are all, legally, members of the state church, if they profess to belong to no other sect) to wake up to what that powerful organization is about, and whither it is tending. On this point, the writings of Dr. Newman, while he still remained within the Anglican fold, are a vast store of the best and the most authoritativ information. His doctrins on ecclesiastical miracles and on development are the corner-stones of the Tractarian fabric. He believed that his arguments led either Romeward, or to what ecclesiastics call "Infidelity," and I call Agnosticism. I believe that he was quite right in this conviction; but while he chooses the one alternativ, I choose the other; as he rejects Protestantism on the ground of its incompatibility with history, so, a fortiori, I conceive that Romanism ought to be rejected, and that an impartial consideration of the evidence must refuse the authority of Jesus to anything more than the Nazarenism of James and Peter and John. And let it not be supposed that this is a mere "Infidel" perversion of the facts. No one has more openly and clearly admitted the possibility that they may be fairly interpreted in this way than Dr. Newman. If, he says, there are texts which seem to show that Jesus contemplated the evangelization of the heathen:

> . . . Did not the apostles hear our Lord? and what was their impression from what they heard? Is it not certain that the apostles did not gather this truth from his teaching? (Tract 85, p. 63).
> He said, "Preach the gospel to every creature." These words need hav only meant, "Bring all men to Christianity through Judaism." Make them Jews, that they may enjoy Christ's privileges which are lodged in Judaism; teach them those rites and ceremonies, circumcision and the like, which hitherto hav been dead ordinances, and now are living; and so the apostles seem to hav understood them (Ibid., p. 65).

So far as Nazarenism differentiated itself from contemporary orthodox Judaism, it seems to hav tended toward a revival of the ethical and religious spirit of the prophetic age, accompanied by the belief in Jesus as the messiah, and by various accretions which had grown round Judaism subsequently to the exile. To these belong the doctrins of the resurrection, of the last judgment, of heaven and hell; of the hierarchy of good angels; of Satan and the hierarchy of evil spirits. And there is very strong ground for believing that all these doctrins, at least in the shapes in which they were held by the post-exilic Jews, were derived from Persian and Babylonian* sources, and are essentially of heathen origin.

How far Jesus positivly sanctioned all these indrainings of circumjacent paganism into Judaism; how far anyone has a right to say that the refusal to accept one or other of these doctrins as ascertained verities comes to the same thing as contradicting Jesus, it appears to me not easy to say. But it is hardly less difficult to conceive that he could hav distinctly negatived any of them; and, more especially, that demonology which has been accepted by the Christian churches in every age and under all their mutual antagonisms. But, I repeat my conviction that, whether Jesus sanctioned the demonology of his time and nation or not, it is doomed. The future of Christianity as a dogmatic system and apart from the old Israelitish ethics which it has appropriated and developed, lies in the answer which mankind will eventually giv to the question whether they are prepared to believe such stories as the Gadarene and the pneumatological hypotheses which go with it, or not. My belief is they will decline to do anything of the sort, whenever and wherever their minds hav been disciplined by science. And that disciplin must and will at once follow and lead the footsteps of advancing civilization.

The preceding pages were written before I became acquainted with the May number of this review, wherein I discover many things which are decidedly not to my advantage. It would appear that "evasion" is my chief resource, "incapacity for strict argument" and "rottenness of ratiocination" my main mental characteristics, and that it is "barely credible" that a statement which I profess to make of my own knowledge is true. All which things I notice, merely to illustrate the great truth, forced on me by long experience, that it is only from those who enjoy the blessing of a firm hold of the Christian faith that such manifestations of meekness, patience, and charity are to be expected.

I had imagined that no one who had read my preceding papers could entertain a doubt as to my position in respect of the main issue as it has been stated and restated by my opponent:

> an Agnosticism which knows nothing of the relation of man to God must not only refuse belief to our Lord's most undoubted teaching, but must deny the reality of the spiritual convictions in which he lived and died.*

That is said to be "the simple question which is at issue between us," and the three testimonies to that teaching and those convictions selected are the Sermon on the Mount, the Lord's Prayer, and the Story of the Passion.

My answer, reduced to its briefest form, has been: In the first place, the evidence is such that the exact nature of the teachings and the convictions of Jesus is extremely uncertain, so that what ecclesiastics are pleased to call a denial of them may be nothing of the kind. And, in the second place, if Jesus taught the demonological system involved in the Gadarene story—if a belief in that system formed a part of the spiritual convictions in which he lived and died—then I, for my part, unhesitatingly refuse belief in that teaching, and deny the reality of those spiritual convictions. And I go further and add, that exactly in so far as it can be proved that Jesus sanctioned the essentially pagan demonological theories current among the Jews of his age, exactly in so far, for me, will his authority in any matter touching the spiritual world be weakened.

With respect to the first half of my answer, I hav pointed out that the Sermon on the Mount, as given in the first gospel, is, in the opinion of the best critics, a "mosaic work," of materials derived from different sources, and I do not understand that this statement is challenged. The only other gospel, the third, which contains something like it, makes, not only the discourse, but the circumstances under which it was delivered, very different. Now, it is one thing to say that there was something real at the bottom of the two discourses—which is quite possible; and another to affirm that we hav any right to say what that something was, or to fix upon any particular phrase and declare it to be a genuin utterance. Those who pursue theology as a science, and bring to the study an adequate knowledge of the ways of ancient historians, will find no difficulty in providing illustrations of my meaning. I may supply one which has come within range of my own limited vision.

In Josephus's "History of the Wars of the Jews' (chap. xix) that writer reports a speech which he says Herod made at the opening of a war with the Arabians. It is in the first person, and would naturally be supposed by the reader to be intended for a true version of what Herod said. In the "Antiquities," written some seventeen years later, the same writer givs another report, also in the first person, of Herod's speech on the same occasion. This second oration is twice as long as the first, and though the general tenor of the two speeches is pretty much the same, there is hardly any verbal identity, and a good deal of matter is introduced into the one which is absent from the other. Now Josephus prides himself on his accuracy; people whose fathers might hav heard Herod's oration were his contemporaries; and yet his historical sense is so curiously undeveloped, that he can, quite innocently, perpetrate an obvious literary fabrication; for one of the two accounts must be incorrect. Now, if I am asked whether I believe that Herod made some particular statement on this occasion; whether, for example, he uttered the pious aphorism, "Where God is, there is both multitude and courage," which is given in the "Antiquities," but not in the "Wars," I am compelled to say I do not know. One of the two reports must be erroneous, possibly both are: at any rate, I cannot tell how much of either is true. And, if some fervent admirer of the Idumean should build up a theory of Herod's piety upon Josephus's evidence that he propounded the aphorism, is it a "mere evasion" to say, in reply, that the evidence that he did utter it is worthless?

It appears again that, adopting the tactics of Conachar when brought face to face with Hal o' the Wynd, I hav been trying to get my simple-minded adversary to follow me on a wild-goose chase through the early history of Christianity, in the hope of escaping impending defeat on the main issue. But I may be permitted to point out that there is an alternativ hypothesis which equally fits the facts; and that, after all, there may hav been method in the madness of my supposed panic.

For suppose it to be established that gentile Christianity was a totally different thing from the Nazarenism of Jesus and his immediate disciples; suppose it to be demonstrable that, as early as the sixth decade of our era at least, there were violent divergencies of opinion among the followers of Jesus; suppose it to be hardly doubtful that the gospels and the Acts took their present shapes under the influence of these divergencies; suppose that their authors, and those through whose hands they passed, had notions of historical veracity not more eccentric than those which Josephus occasionally displays—surely the chances that the gospels are altogether

* Consider Tertullian's "sister" ("hodie apud nos"), who conversed with angels, saw and heard mysteries, knew men's thoughts, and prescribed medicin for their bodies (De Anima, cap. 9). Tertullian tells us that this woman saw the soul as corporeal, and described its color and shape. The "Infidel" will probably be unable to refrain from insulting the memory of the ecstatic saint by the remark that Tertullian's known views about the corporeality of the soul may hav had something to do with the remarkable perceptiv powers of the Montanist medium, in whose revelations of the spiritual world he took such profound interest.

† See the New York World, for Sunday, October 21, 1888; and the "Report of the Seybert Commission," Philadelphia, 1887.

‡ Dr. Newman's observation that the miraculous multiplication of the pieces of the true cross (with which "the whole world is filled," according to Cyril of Jerusalem; and of which some say there are enough extant to build a man-of-war) is no more wonderful than that of the loaves and fishes, is one that I do not see my way to contradict. See "Essay on Miracles," second edition, p. 163.

§ "An Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrin," by J. H. Newman, D.D., pp. 7 and 8. (1878.)

* Dr. Newman faces this question with his customary ability. "Now, I own, I am not at all solicitous to deny that this doctrin of an apostate angel and his hosts was gained from Babylon: it might still be divine nevertheless. God who made the prophet's ass speak, and thereby instructed the prophet, might instruct his church by means of heathen Babylon" (Tract 85, p. 83). There seems to be no end to the apologetic burden that Balaam's ass can carry.

trustworthy records of the teachings of Jesus become very slender. And as the whole of the case of the other side is based on the supposition that they are accurate records (especially of speeches, about which ancient historians are so curiously loose), I really do venture to submit that this part of my argument bears very seriously on the main issue; and, as ratiocination, is sound to the core. Thirteenth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union.

OFFICIAL CALL.

The next Annual Congress of the American Secular Union will be held in Philadelphia on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, October 25, 26, and 27, 1889. It is deemed expedient to hold this meeting where our society was organized in 1876, and where the so-called "National Reform Association" has its headquarters and has recently held an important convention, and for many historic and other reasons.

The general object of our Association not being well understood, it is therefore often misrepresented. It is deemed proper to here make a brief statement of its leading principles. While our federal and state constitutions are formed on the assumption of the total separation of church and state, yet both the general and state governments maintain numerous practical connections of the state with the church. Moreover, a large, wealthy, and influential organization exists, having for its avowed object the amendment of our federal and state constitutions, so as to recognize and enforce by law certain forms of religious belief and observances, and certain acts of legislation hav actually been proposed and discussed in the United States Senate for virtually establishing a form of sectarian religion, especially in our public schools.

Against these innovations and perversions we are organized to protest, and to this end we advocate the equitable taxation of church property; the total discontinuance of religious instruction and worship in the public schools; the repeal of all laws enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath; the cessation of all appropriations of the public funds for religious institutions; the abolition of state-paid chaplaincies; the substitution of simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury for the judicial oath; the non-appointment of religious fasts, festivals, and holidays by public authority; the practical establishment of simple morality and intelligence as the basis of purely Secular government and the adequate guarantee of public order, prosperity, and righteousness; and whatever other measures or principles may be necessary to the total separation of church and state.

To this Congress we cordially invite all true patriots without regard to their individual religious belief or disbelief, who are willing to work for the maintenance of the Secular principle in our civil government, and to oppose the machinations of sacerdotalists, whether Catholic or Protestant, in their schemes to gain ecclesiastical supremacy, and destroy the mental and moral liberty of the free citizens of this most successful of all Secular civil governments in ancient or modern times.

All Charter and Life Members, all Vice-presidents, all Chairmen of State Executiv Committees, and all duly accredited delegates from Local Secular Societies are entitled to seats and votes in this Congress. Each Local Society is entitled to send its President, Secretary, and three other delegates. Annual Members by payment of one dollar are entitled to seats.

Particulars as to the place of meeting, speakers, and their subjects, etc., will be announced hereafter.

At the Pittsburgh congress we first had the pleasure of meeting Thomas Monaghan, one of the pillars of the Manhattan Liberal Club. A well-preserved, honest-featured, open-hearted, genial gentleman, was the impression we received as we gave him a cordia greeting. When the pledges were being made Dr. Foote started up the financial activity among the New Yorkers with $100 (and has nearly doubled it), Brothers Geiger and Monaghan each pledged $50, and the audience gave the generous New Yorkers a hearty cheer. The Friday following I met the Manhattan Liberal Club. Brother Monaghan wished then to pay his pledge but I begged him not to do so, as I was afraid of losing it. He gave me his address to send when wanted, and it came promptly on the first call.

During the club's session Brother Wakeman brought to its notice a case of Comstockian persecution, and, without going into details, asked that some member of the club go Dr. Kinget's bond for a considerable sum. There was no carping as to whether the doctor had done the judicious or the right thing. The unanimous sentiment was that a friend and member had been assailed. That was enough, as to listen to evil of a friend lacks all the elements of true friendship, for no one needs a friend when all is fair sailing. Again Thomas Monaghan distinguished himself as a gallant soldier in the grand army of humanity, and as a true representativ of the kind of Liberalism engendered by the Manhattanites. This forcibly reminded me of the "mad king's" motto:

> Speaks some one evil of thy trusted friend?
> Believe him not—thy friend in faith defend.
> Speaks the whole world with its malicious might!
> Mistrust the world, and giv thy friend the right.
> . . . . . .
> The loyal heart is such a jewel rare,
> The earth yields naught that with it can compare.

There are many kind of heroes, and in that category we cheerfully class such men as Thomas Monaghan, and the Manhattan Club should feel as proud in the possession of such generous-hearted members as it is of its lofty intellectual standard.

I am happy to observe that Liberals in Montana are waking up to the necessity of Secular work. As the American Secular Union has sent out nearly all the literature it had to the points where new constitutions were under consideration, doubtless some of it has fallen into the hands of Brother W. B. Ramsdell, of Egan, who so appreciates our efforts as to assist with a very Liberal donation, nor does he propose to stop at that but intends interesting others in his vicinity in Secular propaganda. That is what is needed, and Brother Ramsdell fully appreciates the gravity of the situation, as he closes his letter to friend Wettstein with: "The recent developments in the Cronin case should actuate all Liberals to renewed efforts." Many thanks to our Montana friend for this evidence of interest and encouragement.

Vice-President Wardwell is our foremost champion in Idaho territory, and one who is ever ready to act and work in the Secular cause—to push the car of progress and assist the Secular pilgrim. Whenever the financial outlook is somewhat gloomy, Brother Wardwell's contribution can safely be counted on.

Brother Wardwell has, I believe, a fine structure at Emmetts which he is willing to donate to the Secular cause if a permanent organization can be formed and the building used for the purpose he would designate.

It is strange, indeed, if such a noble purpose shall be thwarted through cowardice and indifference. Let Liberals of Emmetts be up and doing and show themselvs worthy of Mr. Wardwell's efforts.

Brother Gerer pledged $5 for this year's Campaign Fund, and here is his letter, which shows he is one of the sterling stock we cannot afford to lose:

CROMWELL, July 14, 1889.

E. A. STEVENS, My Dear Friend: Inclosed find the wherewith to cancel my pledge made, it seems to me a year ago, and I hope the additional will, in a measure, recompense the Union for the long delay, the cause whereof it is unnecessary to explain. Suffice it to say it could not be done sooner. This morning I was made happy in reading the "Roll of Honor" as published in THE TRUTH SEEKER. For let me assure you it grieves me to see it look slim and meager, as it has sometimes. Duly appreciating your efforts and those of the other officers of the Union to keep us free a little longer, and hoping I may be able to giv the wheel another turn for progress and Universal Mental Liberty, I am fraternally,

JACOB GERER.

That tried and true Secularist, Thomas Goddard, who only last month sent us a similar contribution, again comes to the front with his customary generosity. This feeble old warrior is stronger for liberty and justice in all his physical weakness than a thousand healthy but namby-pamby Liberals. He flatteringly remarks: "Your noble efforts for progress are highly appreciated in this vicinity."

The following is self-explanatory:

PITTSBURGH, July 8, 1889.

MY DEAR MR. STEVENS: I beg you to excuse me for being so late of relieving myself of the pledge made at the congress of the American Secular Union at Pittsburgh. I wish I could send a thousand times that much. The heart is willing but the finances are weak. I hav been reading your last report in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and, as an old Turner, was very much pleased with it. But I think so much of the founder of the Turner schools I don't like to see his name misspelled. It is no fault of yours, but the name should be Jahn—not John. He began to work when Germany needed men, and he knew how to build them not only bodily, but mentally too. Find within post-office order for $5. Yours truly,

GEORGE COOK.

Brother Cook certainly has my sympathy in regard to the spelling of Father Jahn's name. It cost me a few forcible expletivs. His earnest desire for the financial upbuilding of the American Secular Union is certainly heartily appreciated. The Turners and the American Secular Union ought to combine so far as possible as the future guardians of liberty.

Another Pennsylvanian heard from:

CLARA, PA., July 14, 1889.

E. A. STEVENS, Dear Sir: Although personally a stranger to you, I take great interest in your work for the grand principles of Liberalism, and read with pleasure every week your reports in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I inclose $5 to help along the great work of the American Secular Union. We hav many Liberals about here, but our organization is inactiv. I am proud of your effectiv work as secretary of the American Secular Union. May the cause prosper.

Yours for Mental Liberty, J. L. ALLEN.

Brother Allen must accept our sincere thanks in behalf of the Union for his good wishes and good work.

Brother Bosworth is another veteran worker whom we hav often met at Liberal gatherings. He is ever alive to the interest of the American Secular Union, and earnestly hopes the text-book project may be accomplished so that he might liv to see it.

Mr. and Mrs. Fray, of Verona, Pa, are both sturdy English Secularists, and though their hands are horny with hard labor, they hav the hearts and aspirations of heroes. A dollar from them is a sacrifice, but we remember that no cause can prosper for which sacrifices are not made. All honor to those who deny themselvs that liberty may liv.

When the army rallies to the bugle call of liberty, there is hope for the aims of the American Secular Union. Comrade Miller writes:

TROOP M, EIGHTH CAVALRY, FORT MEADE, S. DAK., July 29, 1889.

MR. E. A. STEVENS, Secretary American Secular Union, Dear Sir: In response to your appeal in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 27th, please find inclosed postal note for $2.

Yours very truly, CHARLES MILLER, First Sergeant.

It takes a clear head and considerable education to be first sergeant of a cavalry troop, and the splendid penmanship of Sergeant Miller shows him to possess superior accomplishments. May his chevrons soon be replaced by shoulder-straps.

GOD IN THE CONSTITUTION.

The constitutional convention of the state of Washington is divided considerably on the question of deity. The larger portion of even the orthodox seem to regard this as a step in the direction of a union of church and state, while their opponents very properly objected to sentimental legislation.

A remarkable declaration was made by a Mr. Sullivan that he believed the proposition to recognize a deity was all buncombe and intended for political effect. After a hot wrangle the amendment was referred back to the committee from whence it originated. The Chicago Times has, I believe, dropped again its Jesuit editor, for on this it says editorially:

> The Constitution of the United States of America does not recognize the deity, and every effort to hav it amended in that direction has failed up to the present time. The Constitution of the United States was framed at a time when the writings of Voltaire, Hume, Gibbon, and Tom Paine were exerting a world-wide influence upon the minds of public men even in colonial America. Unbelievers doubtless were in the majority. The old puritanical ideas of New England were scouted on all sides, and it is claimed that a majority of the signers of the Declaration of American Independence were professed and pronounced Infidels.
> Whatever the belief of the framers of the Constitution may hav been, they were polite enough at least to avoid a religious controversy with the Atheists and Infidels by whom they were surrounded. It was an easier matter to leave the name of God out of the Constitution than to provoke a debate and probably a quarrel which might hav resulted in the disunion of the states already inclined in that direction. But in view of the fact that the Constitution of the United States recognized human slavery, perhaps it was just as well that it omitted the recognition of the almighty.

A lecture on the "Founders of the American Republic" has had the effect, apparently, of getting the newspapers to post themselvs on American affairs. Since Irish political stock is not so high, they hav time to look at American history.

E. A. STEVENS,
Secretary American Secular Union.

Report of the Milwaukee Liberal Club.

I desire through the widely circulating TRUTH SEEKER to giv a brief account of the doings of the Milwaukee Liberal Club, which was organized about a year ago and which has now closed its meetings till September.

Our platform is as is declared by Article 1 of the constitution: "The object of this club is the holding of meetings and the maintenance of a free platform, for the presentation and discussion of any and all subjects that pertain to the welfare of humanity, in the interest of a broader education and larger liberty."

We hav a nice hall, and hire a pianist who opens the exercises with a selection of music. Then we hav a recitation or reading from some one selected for that purpose. This is followed by a song. Then the lecture of the evening, followed by criticisms; and while these hav been many times somewhat warm and stirring there has been no unkind or discourteous treatment of anyone during the year.

To show the range of subjects we hav discussed I will giv the speakers and their themes as they hav been reported by the secretary: "The Cause of Hard Times," Robert Schilling; "The Ballot a Natural Right," R. G. Comstock; "The Anatomy of Happiness," Dr. Storke; "Disease and Its Treatment," Dr. Juliet H. Severance; "Prohibition," Mr. Lucombe; "November 11th, Retrospect and Prophecy," Dr. Krackoweizer; "Quacks and Quackisms," Dr. U. D. Thomas; "Tobacco," Gertie Tyler; "Business Methods," Paul Bechner; "The Jury System," V. Shawvan; "The Art of Expression," J. T. Kelly; "Character and Philosophy of Emerson," E. G. Comstock; "The World of Letters," Dr. Storke; "Psychology and Psychometry," U. D. Thomas; "Bloodshed Unnecessary," Robert Schilling; "Will the Coming Man be Religious?" John Johnston; "Thomas Paine the Author-Hero of the Revolution," Dr. Juliet H. Severance; "Natural Rights versus Legal Rights," Gustav Rahn; "Tricks of Trade, or Commercial Dishonesty," Dr. T. W. Williams; "Will the Coming Man be Religious?" a reply to Johnston, E. G. Comstock; "The Labor Problem," Mr. Gompers; "The Chinese Puzzle," Major Almy Aldrich; "Secular Theism," U. D. Thomas; "The Necessity of a God," Mr. Doyle; "Railway Reform," Arthur Bate; "Education in Our Public Schools," Maximillian Grossman; "What Has our Government Accomplished in the Last Century?" Dr. Krachoweizer; "The Religions of the Past," E. G. Comstock; "Dangers to American Liberty," Dr. Juliet H. Severance; "The Anglo-Saxon a Myth," J. T. Kelley; "The Coming Religion," E. G. Comstock; "Is Marriage a Failure?" Dr. Juliet H. Severance; "The Early Days of the Republic," Horace Rubler; "Woman as a Teacher," Maximillian Grossman; "Our Environments," G. W. Hazleton; "Looking Backward," reviewing Bellamy, R. Schilling; "Modern Spiritualism," Dr. Juliet H. Severance; "Freedom Versus Slavery," A. B. Severance; "Who will Settle the Question Between Capital and Labor?" Colonel Pier; "Education," Paul Beckner; "Christian Ideals Versus Agnostic Fallacies," D. T. Kennedy.

The press has treated us with the utmost courtesy, making fair reports of our meetings. I write thus at length with the hope that it may inspire others with a feeling of confidence in the success of meetings where a free, untrammeled utterance may be given to the most advanced thought. Our club has never catered for public approval, but has commanded the respect of all thinking citizens, and we are never at a loss to secure the best speakers in the city. When a person is invited to lecture, and he makes the inquiry of the committee, "What do you wish us to speak upon?" the reply is made, "On the subject that most interests you, and that you know the most about." In this way, all thinkers and reformers can work together to educate and develop a higher order of civilization. Brother Longley, come to Milwaukee, and you shall hav no limitations set to your speech, except parliamentary law.

JULIET H. SEVERANCE, M.D., President.

Eminent Women.

FRANCES WRIGHT.

Of all the women of whom I hav read or heard, one stands preëminently first and foremost—Frances Wright, or, as she was usually called, Fanny Wright.

When a girl in my mother's home, I used to name all my pet cows and cats Fanny, in love and honor of the one woman who embodied so much of boldness of thought, and true reverence for all that was good, honest, and humane. In her I saw the

> Fairest of life's children, last and best
> Of nature's works, creature in whom excelled
> Whatever can to sight or thought be formed
> Lovely, loving, good, amiable, or sweet.
> —Adapted.

I declaimed extracts from her writings at school exhibitions, and wrote them with lead pencils on the eggs we sent to market, and on the bench-backs in front of me as I sat in the old Quaker meeting-house during our "first-day meetings."

We are all prone to hero-worship, and Fanny Wright was my first hero, and well did she merit and deserve the appellation.

Born away back in 1795 in Dundee, Scotland, that land of stern, uncompromising thinkers, she was heir to an intellect that placed truth, honor, and human equality as the standard of all excellence, and the one goal worthy of all sacrifice in the attaining thereof. On her tombstone are engraved the following sentiments, which were the mainspring of all her life-work:

> I hav wedded the cause of human improvement; staked on it my fortune, my reputation, and my life.
> Humankind is but one family; the education of its youth should be equal and universal.

Frances Wright comes of a splendid lineage, thus inheriting the strong, vigorous, and cultivated intellectuality which made her a very queen among women, and one supereminently fitted to lead, guide, and instruct.

Left an orphan at the age of two and a half years, and reared among people who had no sympathy with her peculiar views and opinions, she devoted herself to the study of the sciences, and of ancient and modern literature and the arts, and often surprised her teachers by questionings which they were unable to answer. Being checked on one occasion by a shrewd mathematician and physician, who observed that her questions were dangerous, she replied, "Can truth be dangerous?" "It is thought so," was the answer. She learned on that occasion two things: The one, that truth had still to be found; the other, that men were afraid of it.

When about fifteen years old she was so impressed by the sight of the painful labors and toil of so many of the aged poor of the English peasantry, and saw them so frequently ejected from house and home by wealthy landed proprietors, that the deepest sympathies of her heart were stirred, and she began studying why these things need be, and asked herself, "Has man then no home upon earth, and are age and infirmity entitled to no care or consideration?" After deeply considering the situation, she "pronounced to herself a solemn oath to wear ever in her heart the poor and the helpless, and to aid in all that she could in redressing the grievous wrongs which seem to prevail in society." At this crisis her thoughts turned to America—a land consecrated to freedom—an ideal home of all that was grand, noble, and good.

In 1818 she came hither, and for two years carefully studied our laws, institutions, and the workings of the principles of the country; then she returned home and published her first book, entitled, "Views of Society and Manners in America." This book sold rapidly, and brought Frances Wright prominently before the public. She went to France to continue her studies of republicanism. While there she met General Lafayette, who became a warm and admiring friend of the girlish author, "whose ardent admiration of the new republic was only equaled by his own."

In 1824 she returned to America, and with the usual enthusiasm of a new and eager disciple of reform, astounded at the phase of negro slavery in a land where "all men are born free and equal, with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," she at once set about trying to make conduct and facts tally with professed principles and theories.

She bought two thousand acres of land in Tennessee and purchased several families of negroes, and for some years she and her sister, and sister's husband, tried to educate them for freedom. The experiment proved a failure, so she gave the slaves their freedom and sent them to Hayti, providing each with a small capital on which to begin a life for themselvs.

In love with Communism, she now took editorial charge of the New Harmony Gazette, changed afterward into the Free Enquirer.

In her nineteenth year she wrote "A Few Days in Athens," a book full of bold and daring Freethought and Liberalism. A warm, loving, tender, sympathetic book. A book which, if it had no other merit, deserves eternal renown and honor for placing the good old philosopher and teacher Epicurus in so happy, true, and beautiful a light as to make all who read it feel an admiration, reverence, and love for this much abused and universally maligned philosopher, whose name has undeservedly become a synonym for all that is grossly sensual and voluptuous—especially as regards a fastidious taste for tid-bits and choice dainties, that tickle the palate and please the appetite.

One cannot read "A Few Days in Athens," and not feel a thrill of gratitude to the author for showing us the real Epicurus, just as he was in his home and garden in Athens—a philosopher, a wise, good, humane, and noble man, chaste and temperate, almost to extremes, and beloved and worshiped by his friends and pupils.

If Fanny Wright had done nothing worthy of note save writing this one book, it would be all-sufficient to immortalize her memory for truth's own sake.

It was in 1828 that the standard of the Christian party in politics was openly unfurled. Of this party, which had been long secretly at work, Frances Wright had previously detected the maneuvers in all sections of the country. This was an evident attempt, through the influence of the clergy over the female mind, to effect a union of church and state, and with it a lasting union of bank and state, and thus effectually to prostrate the independence of the people and the institutions of the country. Clearly distinguishing the nature of the move, she determined to arouse the whole American people to meet it at whatever cost to herself.

She delivered her first lecture in Cincinnati, and her advent as a public speaker created a great sensation. Young, educated, intelligent, and of blue blood, refined and wealthy, people could not wonder enough at her bold and "unwomanly" course.

Being a pioneer woman in the lecture field, she had all sorts of calumnies to endure, and men were frightened lest their wives should learn from her example "something that would induce them to question masculin supremacy."

She and Robert Dale Owen in company wrote and published certain popular tracts. J. H. Noyes called her "the spiritual helpmate and better half of Owen," and says: "Our impression was that not only was she the leading woman of the Communistic movement of that period, but she had a very important agency in starting two other movements which hav had far greater success—antislavery and woman's rights. She was indeed the pioneer of the strong-minded women."

She not only gave her time and talents and money for all reforms, leading, guiding, and pushing men out of wrong paths into right ones, but finally gave herself and her fortune to a man who, in the end, proved himself all unworthy of so grand and noble a friend and companion, M. Phiquepal D'Arusmont. He may hav been worthy of her when they married, but after a dozen or more years of happiness they separated. He had probably reached one of Helen Gardener's "Time Locks" of some thief of an old ancestor, for though he had been penniless but for her, yet he meanly endeavored to wrest her property from her, under the statutes that make a woman's person, goods and chattels, all pass to the ownership of the man who marries her. He also robbed her of her daughter on the plea that the mother wished to educate her for a public speaker. So Fanny was left husbandless and childless in her old days. Probably she found her full meed of happiness in knowing she had lived a good, useful, and noble life, and the seed she had sown would blossom into lives of beauty and blessing long after those who maligned and misused her had passed away and been forgotten.

Those specially interested in knowing more of this inestimable woman, will find some thirty pages devoted to her biography in Sarah A. Underwood's "Heroins of Freethought," from which I hav culled much material for these brief mentionings.

> Births hav brought us richness and variety,
> And other births will bring us richness and variety, but the world will never produce another Frances Wright. Beloved and sacred be her name and memory, and especially so to woman, for she was a champion of woman's equality in the broadest, truest sense of the word.

ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

In Church.

A sudden shifting light that paints
  Your dead-white brow and dead-gold hair
Comes from the rows of gaudy saints,
  The puppets in the window there,
That watch and keep you free from harm—
  So the church teaches you to say;
But all the tribe could scarcely charm
  Your tedious righteousness away.

What should you know of love and hate?
  You are like one of those who bore
Full lamps at watch-time, fain to wait
  Till Christ should pull them through the door:
Well satisfied and well content,
  You see some with their lamps gone out,
Locks torn and garments frayed and rent,
  And take much joy of it, no doubt.

Go, watch and pray; to-morrow's sun
  May find not your sweet limbs alive;
And glad for many a soul undone
  (Go, watch and pray) your soul shall thrive;
And he that fed five thousand, he,
  With some small fishes and two loaves,
Shall kiss your lips and bid you see
  The lost wail past in huddling droves.

Could mere men love you? Men draw nigh
  To Paphos and the Cyprian fire
Where Venus stood like death on high
  Beyond man's love and man's desire;
For human eyes learn women's ways,
  And fingers touch a woman's hair,
But you!—the window's purple haze
  Encrowns you Venus in its glare.

Yet once one understood you well
  With all your magic, body and soul,
Whose heart you found a thing to sell,
  Whose curse became an aureole
Around your brows. O steril saint,
  The girls that walk the lamplit way
With draggled charms of gauds and paint
  Shall mock you some time. Watch and pray.

A Singular Experiment and Its Results.

The New York Press recently sent a young lady reporter, very poorly, but decently clad, to various churches for a few Sundays to see whether poor people are welcome or not in such places. The story of the reporter was printed, and is to the effect that out of eleven fashionable churches visited she was cordially welcomed at four, tolerated, but rather coldly treated at two, given good seats at three, though regarded with apparent curiosity, and told that there were no seats at two. She was the only poorly dressed person visible at any of the churches.

A Catholic Citizen.

The newspapers report that Kilrain, the Catholic prize-fighter, went on a tear at Baltimore, Md., the other night, amusing himself in smashing windows, etc., and conducting himself in the most outrageous and disgraceful manner generally.

W. S. BELL will lecture at the following named places in Washington territory: Hoquiau, August 15th, 16th; Aberdeen, 17th, 18th; Montesana, 19th, 20th, 21st; Cosmopolis, 22d, 23d; Elma, 24th, 25th, 26th; Oakville, 27th, 28th, 29th; Olympia, September 1st; Ellensburgh, 3d, 4th, 5th; Davenport, 7th, 8th; Spokane Falls, 9th, 10th, 11th; Waverley, 13th, 14th, 15th.

The Great National Sunday Law Petition.

Six months ago the friends of civil and religious liberty were startled by the announcement that the National Sunday Law bill had been introduced by Senator Blair, backed by a petition numbering more than fourteen million signatures, the largest petition ever presented in the world's history.

An examination of this "monster petition," however, reveals a comparativly insignificant document. Longer petitions are almost daily presented. The petition in behalf of D. M. Bennett was more than three hundred times as long as this petition. A private citizen of Kansas, John W. Abbott, has obtained a much longer list of signatures in opposition to the bill than was presented by Senator Blair in its behalf. All the signatures presented by Blair could be inscribed with a stub pen on a sheet of foolscap. An expert penman, with a fine steel pen, could copy them all on a postal card.

Of the 14,174,744 "petitioners" presented by the champion of the Sunday bill, 14,174,337 never signed the petition. These figures simply represent the alleged total membership of various churches and other organizations whose representativs, or some of whose officials, had declared in favor of the bill. These include the Methodist Episcopal, Baptist, and Presbyterian churches, whose membership is computed at 5,977,693; the Roman Catholic church, 7,200,000; the Women's Christian Temperance Union, 185,521; the Knights of Labor, 219,000; and the Brotherhood of Locomotiv Engineers, 20,000.

In the preparation and presentation of this petition the most brazen frauds were perpetrated. Let me expose a few of them.

1. The numerical strength of these organizations, particularly that of the churches, was greatly exaggerated. Church statistics, like the published statistics of some Western towns, are heavily padded. The membership of the four religious bodies which are reported as favorable to the bill is computed at over 13,000,000. Connection with the United States census department for two decades disclosed facts which convince me that the total membership of these churches does not exceed 10,000,000. It was not to insure a fair enumeration that church dignitaries induced the census bureau to take this work out of the hands of the regular enumerators and allow the church officials to report to special agents.

2. The right to present the total membership of these churches in the petition in the manner in which it was done, was in nearly every case questionable, and in one or two cases utterly unwarranted. Admitting the propriety of counting the Methodists, whose church government is monarchical and despotic in its character, it was hardly proper to include the 3,000,000 Baptists, whose form of government is congregational, even if a Baptist association had indorsed the movement. So far as the Roman Catholic church is concerned, the advocates of the bill had no more right to include it in the petition than they had to include the Jews, the Turnerbund, or the American Secular Union. By shrewd diplomacy, worthy of his name and his office, Secretary Crafts succeeded in drawing out a friendly letter from Cardinal Gibbons. But in this letter the cardinal clearly stated that he spoke for himself and for himself alone. He did not even sign the petition. Had the Sabbath Union been honest it would hav hesitated before adding even a unit to the sum total of their petition on the strength of this letter. Yet this would-be conservator of public morals does not hesitate to expand this questionable unit into 7,200,000.

3. Not only did the 14,000,000 persons who are reported to hav signed this petition, not sign it, but a very large majority of them are not even in favor of the bill. The Women's Christian Temperance Union is, for the most part, in favor of it. Probably a majority of the members of the Protestant churches named are in favor of it. But a respectable minority, at least twenty-five per cent of them, are not. The Roman Catholics are almost unanimously opposed to it. A devout Catholic declared to me recently that there were not five intelligent Catholics in the United States who favored the bill. His estimate was probably too low, but it is safe to say that nine out of every ten Catholics will sign a remonstrance to the bill if it is presented to them. A very large majority of the Knights of Labor and of the Brotherhood of Locomotiv Engineers are opposed to the bill, notwithstanding Powderly and Arthur were by specious arguments and gross misrepresentations led to indorse it.

4. In presenting this petition, Senator Blair represented, and the petition expressly declared, that these fourteen million indorsers were all "adult residents of the United States, twenty-one years of age or more." And yet one-third of the Protestants and two-thirds of the Catholics included in the list were less than twenty-one years old. Of these so-called petitioners, seven million, the greater part of whom hav never heard of this bill, are children—five million of them the children of parents who are not in favor of it.

5. Again, not only was the insertion of more than one-half of the number presented in this petition a clear forgery, but in order to make out the number claimed many of them were counted at least twice, while some who signed the petition were counted at least three times. Of the one hundred and eighty-five thousand members of the Women's Christian Temperance Union included in the petition, one hundred and twenty-five thousand were members of the three leading Protestant churches, the total membership of which was also included. Fully fifty thousand members of the labor organizations, a majority of them Catholics and opposed to the bill, were counted twice.

This plan of repeating, which was probably suggested by the episcopal elections of the last Methodist general conference, one of the prime movers in this work, was a happy idea with the Sabbath Union. By this means the original number of indorsers presented in the petition can be swelled to enormous proportions. Take the Women's Christian Temperance Union, for instance. The entire membership of this organization was included in the original petition. Then the several state organizations declared in favor of the bill; and now the local societies can each indorse it. The members of this union are nearly all church-members also, and as such can be counted four times or more. Thus the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal church and the general assembly of the Presbyterian church supported the measure, and the entire membership of these churches was put down in the petition. The annual conferences and synods are now indorsing it, and all the members belonging in these can be added. The district conferences and presbyteries can next indorse it, and then the local classes or societies. Finally, the individual members of the union can send in their signatures, and thus be counted eight times. The same method can be pursued with the Knights of Labor and other organizations.

Nor is the foregoing a mere ironical suggestion. It is being done. The American Sabbath Union has its agents at work in every state securing the indorsement of divisions and subdivisions of national organizations whose members hav already been counted from one to six times.

The real strength of these branches can be overestimated by them, also, to a degree that cannot be safely done with the national bodies whose membership is approximately known to the general public. A meeting of the Federated Trades of Washington, composed of about fifty representativs, was captured by the lobbyists of the Sabbath Union, and induced to pass a resolution favoring the Sunday bill. This resolution was immediately paraded as a petition from twenty thousand laboring men, and this in the face of the fact that the total membership of this organization did not exceed nine thousand.

If these frauds are thoroughly ventilated, the advocates of the bill may not venture to materially increase their original claim regarding the numerical strength of their petition. But they will use these local indorsements to control public sentiment, by leading the people, and even Congress, to believe that large and fresh accessions are being made. Indeed, this has already been done. During the last session of Congress Senator Blair presented as supplemental to the original petition, indorsements from the several state organizations of the Women's Christian Temperance Union to the number of some fifty thousand, when they had already been counted several times.

All in all, this movement is a very great fraud, instituted for the purpose of rescuing from decay a still greater fraud, the Christian Sabbath, upon the survival of which depends the very existence of that greatest of all frauds—Christian priestcraft.

J. E. REMSBURG.

"The Problem of Life."

The pagan Greeks and Romans believed that the spirit of man resembles his bodily form, varying its appearance with his variations, and growing with his growth. Heroes to whom it had been permitted to descend into Hades had, therefore, without difficulty, recognized their former friends. Not only had the corporeal aspect been retained, but even the customary raiment.—Draper's Conflict, p. 119.

As a permanent basis for all explanations of the problems raised by Darwin, it has been shown, from several considerations, that the external or corporeal structure of any organic being, is but a tithe of its real and substantial existence—that the life and mental power of each living creature constitute an incorporeal yet substantial organism as real as its anatomical structure.—A. Wilford Hall.

Mr. Lemuel J. Potts puts forth a theory about a spiritual body, and wants to know what I think about it. The only objections I hav to the theory are: First, there is not the slightest evidence that it is true, and second, it does not account for anything if admitted. When did this spiritual organism begin its existence? Was it bestowed upon each individual at birth, as Hall affirms, or did it hav a prenatal existence? Was it first of the size and form of a baby, with only rudimentary teeth, and did it grow to the stature of a man or woman? If it has all the organs of a man, and "grows with his growth and strengthens with his strength," then it must hav been continually passing through processes of rapid change, corresponding with those of the material body, and so, like it, would "lose its identity."

Some years ago, John Bovee Dodds delivered a series of lectures in one of the halls of Congress, by invitation of Webster, Clay, Calhoun, and other noted statesmen, on "Electrical Psychology," in which he elaborated this theory, of a spiritual body, in detail. The lectures were published by Fowler & Wells. At first, I thought there was something in the theory, but when I discovered that it was based upon the immense postulate that the writer knew all about material existences, their capabilities and powers; that the necessity for the existence of this spiritual body was a pure assumption, and the fact of its existence purely a freak of the imagination, I gave it up.

But Hall says that, owing to a circumstance which came under his immediate observation, he was enabled to demonstrate the existence of this spiritual body. His brother was compelled to suffer the amputation of a leg. The knife did not, however, sever the spiritual leg, and hence, between the toes of that leg, he was troubled, for a long time, with annoying itching. When he tried to scratch between those toes he didn't find anything to scratch. Right here, it seems to me, this wonderful demonstration breaks down. If a man has spiritual toes and spiritual fingers to scratch them with, he should be able to relieve the itching in the ordinary way.

A. Wilford Hall has "hopelessly shattered and completely overthrown" the evolution theory just as Parson Jasper has overthrown the Copernican theory in astronomy. It only needs the appending of one of Brother Jasper's sermons to Hall's work, to annihilate all science at once and again permit gods and spirits, priests and mediums, to take possession of the world.

Mr. Potts assures us that the fact that a majority of the scholars of the world accept evolution, does not prove that it is true. No. The fact that the great rivers run by the large towns, does not prove that the location of the towns determined the course of the rivers, but the converse of that proposition, that the course of the rivers determined the location of the towns, is true. So the fact that evolution is a demonstrably true theory, has compelled all scientists to accept it.

Mr. Potts affirms that, "If his [Darwin's] theories were correct, the evidence of amalgamation of species, proving man's relation to the lower animals, would be seen at every turn." Then he tells us that "If Darwin's theory . . . were true, there should be no lower animals in existence!"

We are first asked for the "missing links," and they are being rapidly supplied; but these astute objectors are not going to accept the theory until all the links are found and carefully fitted together, and then they will insist that no such links ought to hav existed. They are not going to make any inferences. They insist that, in this survey, the chain shall be applied to the whole length of the line, and every link carefully examined, and if they come to a river they are not going to measure across it by triangulation, for that depends upon inference, but they will wait patiently for the river to run away or freeze over.

Mr. Potts quotes this, from Darwin: "By this theory innumerable transitional forms must hav existed. Why do we not find them imbedded, in countless numbers, in the crust of the earth?"

Let us take a brief glance at paleontological history. When Hugh Miller wrote the "Footprints of the Creator," he insisted that there were no intermediates between reptils and fishes. On the contrary, with the beginning of the permian age, reptils, in their highest form, both in size and structure, abruptly appear. Now, it is known that amphibians, a class of animals which begin life as fish and evolve into reptils, lived throughout the previous carboniferous age.

Hugh Miller insisted upon the fact that there were no intermediates between birds and reptils. When it was urged that such intermediates must hav existed only their remains had not yet been discovered, he replied that science has nothing to do with possible existences. Her business is to deal with facts as they are known. Since then numerous animals hav been found possessing so many characteristics of both birds and reptils, that it is impossible to classify them as either the one or the other. It is thought wonderful that the theory of gravitation should hav enabled astronomers to locate a planet in the heavens which had never been seen. The theory of evolution has enabled paleontologists to predicate the existence of organisms which had never been seen, and the order of time in which they lived, and new discoveries hav converted these inferences into facts, and are doing so every year.

Hugh Miller insisted that, with the commencement of the tertiary age, mammalian life abruptly appeared. Now it is known that mammals, small in size and with many reptilian characteristics, lived as long ago as the triassic period. Which is like to be the true theory: the one that caused Hugh Miller, in every instance, to make a wrong inference, or the one which enabled the evolutionist, in every instance, to infer the truth?

Does not the fact that each of the higher animals goes through a series of changes in the course of its fœtal development, corresponding to the changes which animal life has passed through in the order and time of appearance on the earth, mean something? Man is first an invertebrate. When he becomes a vertebrate he has gill-arches like a fish, then he has reptilian characteristics, then he becomes a mammal, and lastly assumes his own distinctiv form. These resemblances not only obtain in a general way, but they can be followed into the minutest details of structure in each animal. For instance, the earliest animals which were distinctivly of the deer kind were without horns. Later appeared deer with prongless horns. Then those which had only one prong in a mature state, and so on. The deer of the present hav no horns the first year. They shed their horns each successiv year, and every time a new horn grows it acquires an additional prong. These resemblances hav been carried into every detail of structure. They are all the result of growth, of evolution, and they connect organic life into one continuous whole. Will Mr. Potts point us to some fact which is not accounted for in this way?

Mr. Hall insists that it entirely spoils evolution to hav it work both ways, "up and down, backward and forward." Of course so small a consideration as that the facts are numerous which prove it should not be permitted to count. The old rhyme which relates that some great general,

With ten thousand men,
Marched up the hill and then marched down again, could not hav been true. He must hav got either up or down the hill by a miracle.

Mr. Potts quotes Hall thus: "Any ordinary student might undertake to break down evolution fifty times a day for a week, using Darwin's own books." So any ordinary athlete might undertake to lift himself over a barn by the straps of his boots, fifty times a day for a week, with an equal measure of success.

I will venture to add a little supplement to Mr. James's answer to the statement that "incipient wings are not useful."

Dr. Oswald relates this story in a recent Youth's Companion. I do not remember where the scene of it was. Some boys had captured a squirrel which had escaped from them and climbed a tall tree. The boys had climbed after it, and when it reached the top of the tree it had jumped off, lighting on the roof of a barn without receiving any injury. The boys recaptured it and took it to the top of a cliff, a thousand feet down. The doctor saw them put it down and surround it, and when it could see no other way of escape it deliberately jumped off from the cliff. It ruffled up its hair, spread out its legs, and commenced pawing violently in the air. It was not killed by the fall, but was able to escape into the bushes. Is it not plain that under such circumstances the smallest extension of the skin between the fore and hind legs of a squirrel would be useful?

Let me refer to one specimen which will giv about an average of Wilford Hall's mode of argument and attention to facts. I quote from page 451 of "Problems of Human Life:" "I might here safely leave these rudimentary problems as completely wrenched from the grasp of evolution, but I propose to go farther. If the cow or bovine genus ever had upper incisors what could possibly hav caused their loss? Not the fact of such incisors having become useless, for their absence has caused many a bovine animal to lose its life by being thereby unable to bite off heavy twigs in browsing, to gnaw the bark from saplings, or crop the stunted grass which a sheep with full incisors would grow fat upon."

Thus he goes on, page after page, making an elaborate argument, in a stereotyped book, from the assumed fact that what he calls the bovine genus includes all the ruminants which are destitute of upper front teeth. Of course, if he had thought to look, or had consulted any elementary book on zoology, he would hav known that sheep were as destitute of upper incisors as cows. He would hav found that, with the exception of the camelidæ (camels and llamas), all ruminants are destitute of upper incisors. The camels belong to a very ancient type and at maturity hav two upper incisors. But so far from this being an advantage, though they were once very numerous, they would now probably be extinct were it not for domestication. Of upward of thirty species of animals affiliated with camels the bones of which hav been found in North America not one is left. All that remain on this continent are two species of llamas in South America. Ruminants without upper incisors hav taken possession of nearly the whole world. The gradual loss of upper incisors was accompanied by a profound change in the digestiv system, which enables ruminants to swallow their food hurriedly without mastication, and, when securely hid from their enemies, or from the burning rays of the sun, to chew it over at their leisure.

Wilford Hall makes a final plea for immortality, and complains that scientific investigators seem "even earnestly and almost bitterly opposed to every argument which tends to demonstrate the probability of such a glorious consummation." And yet he devotes a whole book to establishing the "glorious consummation" of eternal damnation to the greater part of mankind. He argues that God is just as good now as he ever can be; and that if his goodness does not prevent his inflicting suffering upon the wicked now, it will not to all eternity. By parity of reasoning, if the goodness of God does not prevent him from allowing the devil to torment his saints and make them miserable here, it will not prevent their being made miserable to all eternity. But the cause of indifference of scientific minds to the alleged arguments for the immortality of the soul and a future life are thus stated by Greg, who was himself a believer in immortality: "The only occasions on which a shade of doubt has passed over my conviction of a future existence hav been when I hav rashly endeavored to make out a case—to giv a reason for the faith that is in me—to assign ostensible and logical grounds for my belief. At such times, and still more when I hav heard others attempting to prove the existence of a future world by arguments which could satisfy no one by whom arguments were needed, I confess that a chill dismay has often struck into my heart, and a fluctuating darkness has lowered down upon my creed, to be dissipated only when I again left inference and induction far behind and once more suffered the soul to take counsel with itself."

A. Wilford Hall is a smart man, but he pursues the theologico-spiritualistic method of drawing upon his imagination for facts, and determining what he knows by what he does not know.

Origin of Christianity.

I do not doubt that one Jesus was stoned and hanged for sorcery 75 B.C., and Paul may hav been present and a spectator; but does that explain the Buddhist organization and ceremonies of the church? Does it explain the existence of the Asiatic or Buddhist church to which, according to Mosheim, Marcion belonged, with its aerial or spiritual savior, and its peculiar but very sensible belief concerning Jehovah, alluded to by Justin Martyr; and Paul's attachment to that faith, and his aversion to everything Jewish, in which Marcion resembled him? Does it explain the existence of the numerous Gnostic churches, with the doctrin of the transmigration of souls, to which some of them held?

Does it explain the non-existence of our gospels for two hundred years after the stoning and hanging, and the violation of Jewish customs in the crucifixion, and the ignorance of judicial proceedings in the account of the trial? Another thing: our gospels were written to describe impossibilities, to fulfill certain alleged predictions in the Old Testament, not the actual life or death of any human being, and therefore the crucifixion was dated back two hundred years, so that everybody was dust who could hav known anything about it.

Josephus was born soon after this crucifixion, and grew to manhood in Jerusalem, but he never heard of it, never saw a Christian, never had his attention called to the rent in the veil of the temple, never made the acquaintance of any of those gentlemen who were brought to life, came up out of their graves, and renewed acquaintance with their old friends; and he lived and died without seeing the savior's tomb, or the little cave where Mary lived, or any of those holy places that are now such fashionable resorts, or drinking any of that blessed milk of the Virgin, barrels and barrels of which were shipped by the Crusaders to Europe; and after his death Eusebius found it necessary, in the interest of Christianity, to interpolate his book; but all he dared to say was that the sect was not extinct.

Now I cannot believe that Christianity originated in Jerusalem. In my opinion it was a gentile institution, older than the Jesus crucified, or the Jesus stoned. We read in Acts, and it is a significant fact, that the disciples were called Christians first at Antioch. Why? We are not told why. But what old Simeon said is worth considering, viz: "God first did visit the gentiles, to take out of them a people for his name." Is it not singular that the old man who took the infant Jesus in his arms and blessed him should be quoted as thus declaring the gentile origin of the church? Not that I believe any God had anything to do with it. But after the church to which Paul and Marcion belonged, adopting the Jewish scriptures, changed its allegiance from the spiritual to the crucified Jesus, it determined to cover up its gentile origin; hence the destruction of books, corrupted and forged epistles, and gospels filled with inconsistencies and contradictions; but something may be learned from the mistakes of their authors and compilers.

It was a mistake to admit that Judas Iscariot was a bishop. It dated the church back. It was a mistake to represent Jesus as hating the Nicolaitans, probably a Gnostic sect in Antioch. It was a mistake to refer to the dispute between Paul and Cephas, in Galatians, as it confirms what Marcion says of Paul's aversion to the law; and to print what Paul says in the epistle to the Romans, where he tells them, before he had visited Rome, "that their faith was proclaimed throughout the world," as that proves the church older than Paul. And when he adds, "mark them which are causing the divisions, contrary to the doctrin which ye learned, and turn away from them," is it not probable that he refers to the controversy concerning "mixing matters of the law of the Old Testament with the words of Paul's spiritual savior?"

It was this controversy which took Marcion from Pontus to Rome, where he spent twenty years, making himself a world-wide reputation. And I cannot believe that he was a myth, or an invention of Tertullian, or a forgery of the fourteenth century. Why did the Romish church follow Paul and Marcion, with hatred, denouncing them as heretics, for centuries? Did Tertullian write those sharp criticisms upon the Old Testament? Did he denounce the ignorance, the inconsistency, the cruelty, the injustice of Jehovah? What could hav been his motiv?

But I repeat what I hav said of Marcion, that for fearlessness, for freedom from superstition, for truthfulness, he stands at the head of Christian theologians; his only weakness being a result of the doctrin of the impurity of matter, in which he was sustained by Paul and the Christian world. He was the advocate of a humane religion, to which no one could object—a religion to which revenge and punishments were unknown; and had he been elected to the supremacy of the church of Rome, to which he aspired, ours would hav been a happier world to day.

Grant that Paul believed in the spiritual savior of the Asiatic church, as Marcion says that he did (and everything that he has written shows the frankness of a truthful man), and we see why his ten epistles, originally as clear as the product of any human pen, through interpolation and forgery are a puzzle to investigators. Grant this belief, and the mystery that for nineteen centuries has hung over the church vanishes forever. S. PALMER.

The Work Is Onward.

The following very able article is only one of many such admirable presentations of facts frequently adorning the columns of the great Portland daily, the Oregonian, the organ of the Republicans, with more extended influence and larger circulation than any other paper of the great Northwest:

WHAT BIBLE?

The Idaho constitutional convention on Tuesday discussed the section of the educational article forbidding the use of sectarian books. We are glad to note that the convention refused a passage to the following amendment:

Provided that nothing herein contained shall be construed to forbid the reading of the Bible in the public schools, nor to enjoin its use.

There was a good deal of demagog talk in favor of this amendment. To acknowledge the influence of the moral teachings of the Bible is one thing, while to make its reading part of the religious exercises in the public schools is quite another thing. If the Bible is to be read, what Bible? the Protestant version or the Catholic, or both? The Old Testament, which the Jew accepts, or the New Testament, which he rejects? Would Idaho teach her children hostility to Mormonism by reading the Old Testament, redolent of polygamy and concubinage, or the monogamic teachings of the New Testament? How could any state expect logically to refuse to support the Roman Catholic parochial schools if it includes among the religious exercises of the common schools the reading of the Bible, that to the Catholic is not simply the "foundation of all morality and truth," but is a sectarian book?

Mr. Poe, of Nez Perces, declared that all our laws are founded upon the Bible. Does Mr. Poe think that the divorce laws, which rule in nine-tenths of the Union and in England, are founded upon the Bible? Does he find the faintest trace of any hostility to polygamy expressed in the Old Testament, even in the Ten Commandments, on which we base our laws which make bigamy, polygamy, and concubinage crimes? Does Mr. Claggett really believe that the Bible is "the foundation of all morality and truth?" Does he really believe that the morality and truth, for which integrity, truthfulness, justice, mercy, temperance, humanity, forgivness of injuries, self-sacrifice, and obedience to conscience stand, had no evangelists before Christ, or no evangelists after Christ that never had a chance to know Christ?

The Bible has more than once been used to fortify human slavery and all the immorality and inhumanity it implies; it has been used as the pedestal of the cruel theocracy of Puritan New England; it is used to-day to justify polygamy by the Mormon; it is used to justify the sentimental, destructiv doctrin of Christian Socialism preached by Victor Hugo. So far from being the foundation of all morality and truth, it is a mixture of truth and error, and its ethics are in many places so execrable that they are not only not practiced, but are under the ban of both the law and the church in all Christian countries. The Bible is no more "the foundation of all morality and truth" than Plato and Aristotle are the foundation of all morality and truth—whether spiritual or scientific. The evolution of all morality and all truth did not begin with the Bible nor end with it, and to pretend that it did is as historically untrue as it would be to say that all we know of applied natural philosophy began and ended with Archimedes, or all speculativ science began and ended with Aristotle.

With such mighty helpers, surely the Liberals should take courage. "She do move." Let us see to it we are doing our part toward educating the honest-hearted in the great truths of Liberalism and the justice of our Nine Demands. C. B. REYNOLDS.

French Schools.

A recently published official report gives some interesting information respecting the elementary schools of France. The statistics presented show that rapid progress is being made in the secularization of the municipal schools. Between 1882 and 1887 the number of such schools with monastic masters or mistresses decreased from 11,000 to 9,000, owing to the gradual substitution of lay teachers; while the schools under lay masters or mistresses increased from 51,000 to 57,000.

Our Congress.

Readers will see in this issue the Call for the Congress of the American Secular Union for 1889, and if they greet it with half the warmth with which we hope for the success of the affair, we shall be glad. Now or never, is what seems to be the burden of the rallying-cry each year, but after all, we may say that it is true each year. We do not know any year what complication in public affairs may ensue, what national emergency may be ushered in, in which much may depend on the advantage we may hav gained just in time by a little organization and effort. We should look upon each year as our last opportunity.

And further, besides these motivs of duty, we should think decidedly that motivs of pleasure ought to be sufficient alone to procure an attendance of the largest proportions. When a Freethinker livs, as some do, among those only that he must regard as natural foes to almost every principle of progress and enlightenment that he carries in his breast; when he has to pass a whole year with no better cheer than the society of those enemies of man's advance and obstacles to his happiness called Christians, if he does not embrace eagerly an opportunity to meet those that he can really call his fellows—those with whom he can hav real companionship—to grasp good hands that he knows neither fumble superstitious wine and dough now nor will ever point a gun against him in fanatical battles for a despots' Jehovah in the future—if, we say, he does not embrace such an opportunity as this, we shall look upon such a one as a phenomenon more unsolvable than all the mathematical puzzles of the creeds. We shall soon hav more to say on the particulars of the gathering. Meanwhile we hav done our duty in putting in our earliest appeal to our friends to come where they can, if they but know it, enjoy themselvs better than they ever did before in their lives.

The New States.

We cannot record as yet a full settlement of the vexed questions exercising the constitution-makers of the West. As soon as the matter is finished and the news is accessible, we will endeavor to present a full account.

Christian partisans are present and activ, but we are pleased to say that our side is not altogether supine, and besides our special advocates there are many good, keen-minded territory men who are showing that they hav heads fuller of common sense than of superstitious rubbish and deference to would-be despots. However, the battle is close. Secretary Wylie of the National Reform Association (God-in-the-Constitution party) reports from one of the scenes of action:

"I hav preached four sermons, occupying each of the Protestant pulpits of the city, hav addressed the constitutional convention, hav conferred with the committee on preamble and bill of rights, hav written for one of the papers of the city, hav interviewed a large number of the members of the convention, and hav secured the activ coöperation of some. I hav also interviewed all the resident ministers and hav secured their coöperation. They are to hold a meeting at 5 P.M. to-day to consider a plan of action. Three forms for the preamble hav already been submitted, one in the convention and two in the committee. The one read in the convention is thoroughly Secular. It was introduced soon after my address, and was doubtless intended to head off any acknowledgment of God. Judge Carland, a member of the committee, introduced one which 'implores the aid of the sovereign ruler of the universe.' But since this convention is making a constitution for a very small part of the universe, why not acknowledge the ruler of nations? Mr. Turner, also a member of the committee, introduced one which contains all we desire. An effort was made to kill it as soon as it was introduced, but the motion did not prevail. It has been proposed to circulate for the signatures of delegates a paper with the following heading: 'Are you in favor of a preamble containing an acknowledgment of almighty God as the source of all authority, of the Lord Jesus Christ as the rightful ruler of nations, and of the Bible as containing the proper standard of morals in civil affairs?'"

A report from Olympia, W. T., reads:

"The convention spent the morning here in discussing a proposition to put the name of the deity in the preamble of the constitution. The preamble as reported by the committee reads:

"'We, the people of the state of Washington, to preserve our rights, do ordain this constitution.'

"Mr. Turner moved to amend by inserting among other words:

"'Profoundly grateful to almighty God for this inestimable right, and invoking his favor and guidance, do ordain,' etc.

"This was part of the dispute. It was opposed solely as being unnecessary and proposed solely as sentimentality. Every speaker professed the greatest reverence for God, but some feared it might be construed to mean the union of church and state. Others said nothing purely sentimental should go in the constitution. Finally a motion to adjourn prevailed, and after dinner the preamble was hastily referred back to its committee to report a new preamble."

We hav procured a copy of the preamble and other declarations and enactments that the National Reform Association presents in all these states for adoption, and will print them for our readers:

"PREAMBLE. We the people of the state of ——, acknowledging almighty God as the source of all authority, the Lord Jesus Christ as the ruler of nations, and his will as supreme law in civil affairs, do ordain this constitution.

"BILL OF RIGHTS. The right of all the people to one day in seven free from common labor, for the purpose of rest and worship, shall be forever maintained in the laws of this commonwealth.

"2. All political power is vested in the people, and all free governments are founded upon that authority which through them is derived from God.

"LEGISLATIV DEPARTMENT. The legislature shall regulate marriage and divorce by laws not inconsistent with Christian morality.

"PUBLIC SCHOOLS. It shall be the duty of the legislature to establish and maintain a system of free public schools adequate for the education of all the children in the state between the ages of six and sixteen years, inclusiv, in common branches of knowledge, and in virtue and the principles of Christian morality." . . .

The promoters of this delightful scheme then set forth "some of the reasons for embodying these principles in the constitution," from which we extract:

"1. It is a fact that God is the source of the authority inherent in the people. Government gets its power from God, or it does not possess it at all.

"2. It is a fact that the Lord is king of nations.

"3. It is a fact that divine will is the higher law for nations. Legislators must make law on many subjects on which God has already legislated. Should not human law harmonize with the divine?

"4. 'The Sabbath was made for man.' It is a God-given right. This right is inalienable. Government should protect us in our rights. Two millions of American citizens labor on the Sabbath. More than a hundred thousand of these are employed in the mail service. Should not something be done for their relief?

"6. There must be a standard of morals in the schoolroom, as well as a standard of definition and pronunciation of words."

These men are traitors. Let every Liberal that has a boy at school learning American history and the Declaration of Independence, call the boy to his knee and point out to him the sentiments above, and let him know whom he has to watch against in his coming manhood.

Among the efforts on our side, most of which we will notice later, there is one of such bright merit that we will notice it in this issue. It is a letter to the convention, in the Fargo Sunday Argus, from a stanch Freethought defender. We will reprint a part of it next week. In Idaho we hav gained the eminent triumph that the Bible is forbidden to be used in the public schools. In Montana friends of the secular affirmation made stout opposition to the words, "So help me God," in the official oath; but with what final success remains to be seen.

While our special interest is with Freethought matters, other reformers are no doubt anxiously awaiting the decisions on their several reforms. In North Dakota the action of the legislature extending suffrage to women has been amended so that before it can operate it must be ratified by a vote of the people. In Montana the last we heard of woman suffrage was one day when it got a vote of 33 to 33, upon which it dropped out of sight, for the time at least. Those who are friends to the single-tax scheme will be interested to learn that a number of advocates of that scheme hav presented its merits. A Mr. Buell, coming from Minneapolis on the 30th ult., addressed the North Dakota convention, advocating that the constitution provide for that system of taxation. The theory that all taxes should be collected from the lands, and improvements and personal property be exempt, is popular with many of the delegates, who are desirous of adopting some plan to reach the speculators who they say hold unimproved land and check the development of the country. Finally, we may add the news that the one-house legislation proposed in North Dakota failed of adoption.

However, our business is with the Liberals trying to establish lasting immunity from the tyranny of bigots, and heartily do we wish success to the noble efforts they are making for us, and for themselvs, and for their children, and for us all.

Our Total Church Exemption.

Another territory in which Freethinkers should rouse themselvs to anticlerical activity is New Mexico. The constitutional convention of that prospectiv state is about to be held. We hav good readers there, whose eyes will be met by this, and we feel that we must adjure them with all the fervor of half a dozen camp-meeting exhorters to exert themselvs and procure a pure constitution. One of these readers we will try to help now. He writes:

"KINGSTON, N. M., July 27, 1889.

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: A member of our constitutional convention asked me for information in relation to the probable value of church property in the United States. He wishes the information for use at the convention which meets on September 3d next. We desire, when this territory becomes a state, that none shall be exempt from taxation.

"If you will kindly insert a few lines in your valuable paper on the above subject, you will very greatly oblige myself, and possibly many others.

"Most respectfully, T. F. CHAPMAN."

It is difficult to gather from among the many and complicated data, the exact amount involved at any one time. The census for 1880 has been long delayed, and we are yet in process of preparing from that and other sources a satisfactory statement on the matter. We hope to hav it ready in time for use by our friend. Meantime we will furnish him with a serviceable enough estimate based upon earlier returns.

The total number of church buildings in the United States is over one hundred thousand. The value of these and their lands we put at $1,500,000,000. Below will be found a table, showing how this property was, at a period a few years ago, distributed through the various states. Unless otherwise stated, the figures are from the United States census of 1870. Those of 1875 are from the state censuses and the churches' year books. That for New York is for 1870, 1875, and the last sum ($101,105,765) is the estimated sum of the present values of property used exclusivly for church purposes. By comparing the figures for 1870 and those (where given) for 1875 in, say New York, for instance, the percentage of increase is seen. This increase in the older states is largely due to the rise in value of real estate:

Alabama	$2,414,515	New Mexico (1870, $322,621)	$365,500
Arkansas	854,975	New Jersey (1870, $18 347,150)	19,043,510
Arizona	24,000	Nevada (1870, $212,000), 1874,	301,450
California	7,404,235	Ohio (1875)	33,328,000

New Hampshire	3,303,780
New York (1870, $66,073,755), 1884	101,105,765	Total	$414,608,241

The six leading sects which participate in this wholesale public robbery are the Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Episcopalians, and Roman Catholics. The amounts respectivly credited to them by the census of 1870 are:

Methodists	$73,975,581
Baptists	41,608,198
Presbyterians	53,265,256
Congregationalists	25,069,698
Episcopalians	36,514,549
Catholics	60,985,566

Now, by computing according to the rate of increase of church property, by actual additions and the rise of real estate, during the period since 1850, we may easily arrive at a close estimate of its value to-day. That rate of increase has been this: It has doubled every ten years. That this is the rate of increase may be seen, not only from our representations, but from those of General Grant, in the extract that we shall giv later on; certainly he is not chargeable with being misled by professional Freethought animus. Now, as the figures presented are, with trifling exceptions, those of 1870, we may for 1880 put them down doubled, in round numbers $800,000,000; and for 1890, $1,600,000,000. We are willing to say, $1,500,000,000. This is in accord with President Grant's computations. A sum that by doubling every decade had reached in 1900 $3,000,000,000 would hav been in 1890 $1,500,000,000, and in 1880 $800,000,000. We, hav, then, in the United States at present say $1,400,000,000 invested in untaxed church belongings. At two per cent rate of taxation (which is an exceedingly low estimate of the average rate) this property should bring the state governments $28,000,000 per annum. Instead of this, it yields not one cent of revenue. It is the most stupendous steal on record. The so-called river and harbor jobs and Star Route swindles were but petty larceny in comparison. Let us, to be on the safe side, suppose that church property has not maintained the same rate of increase (though we hav every reason to suppose that it has, and no reason to suppose that it has not). Let us even call the total to-day $1,000,000,000; still we hav the enormous sum of $20,000,000 as the amount of which the nation is yearly defrauded.

Monarchy is maintained in England at a yearly cost to the nation of nearly $4,000,000, and the people rightfully complain of the imposition; yet the amount of indebtedness from which the Christians of this country are relieved by their property going untaxed would not only support the royal family of Great Britain, but would in addition pay the salaries of all the executiv officers of the United States many times over. Here in America we justly complain of the many drones who hold fat places in the public hive (not the least of which are the chaplains in the army and navy); yet the substance which these absorb is not a tithe of the loss to the people caused by church exemption. All the other public money wasted, stolen, or unlawfully appropriated does not equal that sum.

There are some grave opinions upon this matter from the mouths of our most prominent men, that we hav not infrequently brought to view, and they are of so important a character that we will reprint some of them again, that they may perhaps afford some help to our Western friends in this their "time of peril and need."

James A. Garfield said in Congress, June 22, 1874:

"The divorce between church and state ought to be absolute. It ought to be so absolute that no church property anywhere in any state, or in the nation, should be exempt from equal taxation; for if you exempt the property of any church organization, to that extent you impose a tax upon the whole community."

The New York Evening Post, while conducted by William Cullen Bryant, said:

"The Evening Post has long been of the opinion that the American theory of a self-supporting church ought to be carried out to its full and legitimate conclusion, and that the separation of the church and state ought to be complete. It should include the total discontinuance of contributions of public money, direct or indirect, to the support of any religious establishment. We hav never been able to see the slightest difference in principle between the appropriation of a certain sum of money raised by tax to a particular church, and a release of that church from a tax on its property to the same amount. The cost of the benevolent act in either case falls upon the taxpayers generally."

President Grant, in his annual message of 1875, recommended the passage of a constitutional amendment for the more complete separation of church and state, and referred to the rapid increase of this exempt property as follows:

"In connection with this important question, I would also call your attention to the importance of correcting an evil that, if permitted to continue, will probably lead to great trouble in our land before the close of the nineteenth century. It is the acquisition of vast amounts of untaxed church property. In 1850, I believe, the church property of the United States, which paid no tax, municipal or state, amounted to about $87,000,000. In 1860 the amount had doubled. In 1870 it was $354,483,587. By 1900, without a check, it is safe to say this property will reach a sum exceeding $3,000,000,000. So vast a sum, receiving all the protection and benefits of government, without bearing its proportion of the burdens and expenses of the same, will not be looked upon acquiescently by those who hav to pay the taxes. In a growing country, where real estate enhances so rapidly with time as in the United States, there is scarcely a limit to the wealth that may be acquired by corporations, religious or otherwise, if allowed to retain real estate without taxation. The contemplation of so vast a property as here alluded to, without taxation, may lead to sequestration without constitutional authority, and through blood. I would suggest the taxation of all property equally."

All that any person needs, to be brought to the apprehensions for the future expressed by Grant, is to take a course of reading in universal history of the compass of that with which Grant was familiar. It has everywhere been the case that where the church has been allowed to accumulate property unchecked it has soon verged so close upon absorbing the whole nation that an impoverished people hav had to wrest back their possessions by force. England had to do it in the sixteenth century, France at the Revolution, and late examples are those of Italy and Mexico. The way Americans hav been cajoled and led by ecclesiasticism is almost enough to make one despair of hope that they hav profited by the abundant lessons of the Old World. If our Western friends can be among the first to inaugurate the true separation of church and state, in humanity's name let them bend every energy to the task, and giv all of us hope for a brighter future.

Our friends in the convention may meet with challenges of their statements of figures. We do not claim, as has been seen, rigidly verified accuracy for the main results herein presented, and an error of a small sum would no doubt be caught up and made a to-do over by orthodox partisans. So let our friends keep at hand what censuses for later years they can get and whatever else useful they can get hold of—and good luck to them all.

The Alexandrian Library.

In another column a correspondent requests information on the destruction of the Alexandrian library.

The library was the subject of three separate destructiv attacks. The first was the demolition of half of it by fire at the siege of the city by Julius Cæsar. As the fire was not purposed, but merely an accident of the siege, it requires no attention from us. The next two attacks upon the library were purposed, and are thus the ones to be noticed.

Christianity now arose. It secured to its side the emperor Theodosius; he directed the Christian bishop of Alexandria, Theophilus, to destroy the library. Theophilus executed the order, dispersing the books in every quarter, and they hav never been recovered. The emperor, our correspondent will notice, was not Constantine, but Theodosius.

A part of the collection was still left. In 642 the Mohammedan caliph Omar, being in power, gave this order: If the books contained the same doctrins as the Koran, they could be of no use, since the Koran contained all necessary truths; if they contained anything contrary to that book, they deserved destruction; so, whatever were their contents, they were to be burnt. Pursuant to this order, they were distributed among the numerous public baths, to be used in providing the fires; in which use they lasted six months.

Thus did this magnificent collection of wisdom and science fall victim to religious fanaticism, Christian and Mohammedan.

Elimination of Inconstant Factors.

In endeavoring to ascertain the cause of any given class of effects, the rule of logic is, to eliminate, among the many intermingled factors each one of which is suspected of being the cause, those factors that are inconstant. The remaining constant factor, present in all cases, is plainly the cause. Now, an effect whose cause we wish to ascertain is, our present civilization. So we must examin all the countries in which civilization is present, and eliminate all the factors that are by chance present in some countries but not in others, that is, inconstant. The remaining constant factor, present in all countries, will plainly be the cause.

The honor of being the cause of our civilization is claimed by Christians for their religion, and also by Rationalists for Freethought and material development. Application of the logical method givs a test that is decisiv. On the one hand, every country that has civilization has Freethought and material development, commenced to get civilization not when it had merely Christianity but when it commenced to get Freethought and material development, and now has civilization in degree just proportioned to its degree of Freethought and material development. On the other hand, those countries that hav Christianity only, and hav not Freethought and material development, remain still without civilization. Christianity, then, is an inconstant factor, and is not the cause; Freethought and material development, then, is a constant factor, and is the cause.

Having made the general statements, it remains to name the particular facts in proof. To name the countries that hav civilization, along with Freethought and material development, is unnecessary; the list is lengthy, and we all know them. To name the countries that are without civilization, having Christianity but not Freethought and material development, is what we will now proceed to do.

There are two such countries, and they afford us excellent test cases. One is Spain. Her situation, on a peninsula, the only contiguous country being France, with whom she has always had a hostility that prevented the introduction of French or other improvements, has helped to preserve her isolated from other nations. The other cause of her isolation has been her religious bigotry. At all events, here she has been isolated for centuries. All this time she has been the most intensely, fiercely, hotly Christian nation in the world. Has this Christianity of which they boast produced in her civilization? No. She is a semi-barbarous country to-day.

Abyssinia is the next example. Christianity was introduced there in the year 300. It has flourished luxuriantly. It has caused the Abyssinians to rave, kneel, pray, cringe, split into sects, kill, persecute, and tell lies about one another. In short, it has had all its legitimate effects. But owing to the geographical situation of Abyssinia, Freethought and material civilization did not get in, and to-day the Abyssinians are savages.

Besides these two countries, a late dispatch from Paris calls our attention to another that will probably serve as an example:

"PARIS, July 16th.—A letter has been received by the Paris Geographical Society announcing that Count Teleki, who a while ago discovered the big lake Basso-Narok in east central Africa, found a Christian tribe to the north of this lake. They liv about three hundred miles southwest of Abyssinia. No white man or nativ missionary has ever been among them as far as they know, and Count Teleki is the first to giv any information about them. He believes that at some distant period in the past they hav had relations with the Christian Abyssinians. About eight hundred years ago a princess of the Jewish faith drove out the reigning dynasty in northern Abyssinia, and for a century the Christians were bitterly persecuted. It is thought probable that during this era some Abyssinian families escaped to the south and founded Christian colonies, from whom sprung the Christian nativs whom Teleki has found surrounded on all sides by paganism. Their religion is a very debased form of Christianity, but considerable New Testament history has been handed down to them in traditions, and they hav a priesthood, the cross, and other emblems of Christianity."

Now, are these savages in any degree elevated above surrounding tribes? Does the explorer say he finds in them the arts and sciences of civilization? If Christianity produces all such good things, why has it not produced them there? Why the remarkable exception? Why do we not read of the explorer, astounded, emerging from encircling tribes of low negro trash sunk in their wicked heathen beliefs, to a state of towers and palaces, learning and justice, triumphant proof to be thundered at us from pulpits? Information of some such thing is sadly wanted.

E. J. FOSS, of Rochester, is informed that the chaplains of Congress each draw nine hundred dollars per session for their useless prayers. The state legislatures pay them various sums, usually five dollars per prayer. That is the rate in this state, and the ministers draw it promptly.

THOSE Christians who deny reason to the lower animals are confronted by Sir John Lubbock with many adverse facts, such as the apparent ability of a wasp to count as high as twenty-four, an ability not shared by all races of savages, and its power of knowing beforehand whether one of its eggs will become a male or a female. If the former, the mother wasp puts five insects in the nest for the grub to eat. If the latter, ten, as the female is larger.

Letters from Friends.

WELLESLEY, MASS., July 9, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I cannot tell you how much I rejoice that THE TRUTH SEEKER so fearlessly and so persistently faces the foe for free thought, free speech, and free press, whatever the form in which that foe appears. E. M. F. DENTON.

BRAGGVILLE, MASS., July 14, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find check for $5. I hav had THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year and wish to renew my subscription. I hav got a new subscriber, Mr. Jesse Albro. Every little helps. I like the paper very much. I see some find fault with its size; others think it is too Liberal, others think it is not Liberal enough, and one is afraid to let his Christian friends even see it. Heston is grand. Don't get discouraged. Your paper is doing a great work.

Yours for Truth, T. N. SHERMAN.

NATIONAL CITY, CAL., July 19, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I see your California correspondents are wide-awake, and compare very well with other states. Here we hav no Sunday laws, although the church is not satisfied. Every session of the legislature the representativ of the old chestnut is there in full force praying for special Sunday laws. But our legislators are intelligent, and are thoroughly posted on modern as well as ancient history, and they do not propose to let the state go over to the superstitious orthodox element—to make stringent religious laws for the wholesome secular majority to liv under. A. N. BURGESS.

SNOWVILLE, VA., July 30, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just been reading about the "Phantom Cities" in Yucatan which hav been so long a mystery to the world, and from which no man returns to tell the tale after having started to find them. The country being so inaccessible to explorers and the mission of the traveler so fraught with danger, why could not some of the spirit-historians take the trip and giv us a description of the cities and their inhabitants, and perhaps point out a way whereby they can be safely entered by living explorers?

One such test as this would be worth innumerable messages such as are usually given by the phantoms of the spirit-world. Will some friend tell us why this has not long since been done, and why it cannot now be done?

ELMINA.

CINCINNATI, O., July 20, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Are there any free Americans? I sincerely hope there are millions, and if so, it is quite time for them to wake up in a grand body, full of power, patriotism, and resolve, and see to it now, without delay, that their noble republic fall not under the vile and despotic power and rule of the Roman pontiff, who seeks the life of this great nation, to crush out its liberties, and make it a hotbed and stamping-ground for swarms of lazy priests, monks, nuns, beggars, and pests of all sorts. Brother patriots, I think I hear a roar of voices from every portion of this free republic, with a determined shout, No, no; it never shall be! America shall be ever free from church power, king power, and all other powers which seek to destroy the freedom of this land. Unity, liberty, and fraternity shall ever resist all foes.

T. WINTER.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., July 22, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find the price of "Bible Inquirer" and "What Liberalism Offers in Place of Christianity." I hav been on this side of the water now five years, and all this time I hav been at sea as regards religion, but without reading anything but the Catholic literature that I was brought up in the midst of. I hav come to the conclusion to join the minority, and unfurl my banner to the comforting breeze of science. Every little Freethought scrap I find I gulp down with an appetite that surprises me when I think of it. There is some strange comfort in every line of such writings, vastly differing from that which I was by accident—as far as I had anything to say about it—brought up in by dead, heavy, dull, nightmareish (if you'll allow such an adjectiv) prayers, the same thing night and morn day after day and year after year. I cannot do without such mental comfort as Freethought pamphlets giv, having once tasted it.

Yours, etc., for truth, HUGH MACMAHON.

LAKE CITY, IA., July 11, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to say a few words in regard to my brother's death as many good Christians claim an Atheist cannot die happily. I say Atheist, for that is what he was, pure and simple, perhaps the most outspoken Freethinker in the county he lived in, and could repeat more of Colonel Ingersoll's writings than any man I ever saw, and would do so after being so weak he would stop and rest for lack of breath. He accepted death more willingly than anyone I ever saw, saying he had no respect for a God that was not as good as himself, for he would not damn one of his children one hour for all the money on earth.

The nearer he came to death the more absurd the orthodox doctrin appeared to him. All he desired was an eternal rest. After a lingering sickness, how sweet to lay life's burden down! For the sake of wife and fashion, he was willing a Universalist minister might preach a funeral sermon. The funeral was one of the largest ever held in the village of Watertown. He stopped the usual amount of lies told at the death of a Freethinker by his many expressions of willingness to die, without a single regret.

Thus passes away E. G. Tompkins, of Watertown, O., in his fifty-ninth year of age, a firm skeptic from childhood, always having done right for the love of right and fellow-man, in the place of Jesus, that no one can understand. He leaves a wife and four daughters, three married and one single, all of his faith or way of thinking. His memorial card will be in accordance with his faith.

Now, Mr. Editor, a few words in regard to Mr. Wanamaker. Though a strong Republican, in his case you hav my strongest sympathy, and I say, yes! "giv the devil his due," by kicking Wanamaker out of office. A man that will so far forget his duty in office as to prostitute it to the church power, ought to get out and let a man of brains take his place. Oh, how long, and yet how long, will men be fools?

I close, wishing THE TRUTH SEEKER friends a hearty good-speed, Heston included. May his pictures never grow less.

I am, most truly yours, J. L. TOMPKINS.

WALTON, IND., July 11, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: As I esteem you as a bold champion in the cause of truth and science, I write you to-day to let you know that I yet liv. You may hav but little knowledge of me. I am the man that introduced the first copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER in Cass county, in D. M. Bennett's time. I yet liv, but hav had to go through hell and damnation. I am now old. I am in the seventy-third year of my life. I hav sunk $11,000 by misplaced confidence in those I thought friends, but who hav been my worst enemies. I inclose to you a card showing my style of business—hotel-keeping in Walton, Ind. Seven years ago I lost every dollar I had. I am struggling yet to sustain myself on the principle of honor.

If you see R. G. Ingersoll, the greatest reformer the world has ever known, tell him I hav not forgotten him since my interview with him at the Murdock House at Logansport.

Yours respectfully, D. ENGLER.

NEW HARTFORD, IA., July 22, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Watson Heston's illustrations are immense, and I want to thank him and THE TRUTH SEEKER for them. His last, "Decline of the Papacy in Italy," givs nearly a three hundred years' history at a glance. That great bag of wind, the pope, was prodigious, both for power and evil, in 1600. Now the wind is all out of him, in Italy at least, but we fear not in the United States. This country will witness the last death throes of popery, and that page in history will be blacker than any that has preceded it. That hideous old monster, more devilish in heart than hell was ever pictured, will make this country red with blood before it givs up the ghost; and the spawn from the mother church, Protestantism, will help on the cursed work.

"The Lady of the Club," by Helen N. Gardener, in the last TRUTH SEEKER, should be read by every man and woman in the civilized world. Let every truth seeker read it, at least. Very truly yours, MEL PIERCE.

July 24, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: There has been such a striking case of Christian charity in our village I cannot refrain from writing. In the early part of this season a stranger came to Mr. W. S. Johnstone and hired to him to work on the farm. After about three weeks had expired the family of the aforesaid hired man came to Pocahontas, hired a house, and moved into it. As Mr. Johnstone resided two miles distant, the hired man's going to see his family, who had recently come to town, gave rise to suspicion which resulted in the arrest of said hired man, who proved to be an escaped convict from Indiana state prison. After two days of incarceration the prisoner was sent back to his former place of imprisonment, his family remaining in our town of Pocahontas. A few days later the oldest girl fell sick of a fever. The mother prevailed on the doctor to visit her daughter, who left medicin, leaving directions that it should be given every hour. During nearly a week's illness, which nearly proved fatal, in a Christian town with three churches and pulpit-pounders, one poor Infidel living three miles away from town was all that showed any sympathy. The family was destitute of food and fuel only for the charity of this one Infidel. One Christian lady proved her fidelity to the Christian religion by saying that I should be egged for showing them kindness. Her name is Lilly Jet. That is the kind of lilies Christianity produces. Had this lady never seen a Bible or heard a sermon she might hav been a lady of good feeling.

I wish to say that the Freethinkers' Hymnbook I hav seems to be a gem. I sing my songs in the family circle where I am living, and although they are all Catholics the songs are admired. The old lady of the house has now got the book in her hand silently perusing its contents. She has had me transcribe two of them for her, and now she interrupts me to ask me to transcribe another, so the good work goes on.

I wish to say before I close that the article in our paper entitled, "The Lady of the Club," made a great impression upon me, and I sent the paper by mail to an old Presbyterian preacher in hopes it will soften him.

Long liv the grand old TRUTH SEEKER. From your brother in the cause of Liberalism,

EX-REV. JOSEPH N. MAXEY.

FRENCHTOWN, NEB., July 18, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I hav no doubt E. W. Miner, of Hay Springs, is doing a laudable work trying to colonize Liberals, and I sincerely hope he will succeed; but if he could come to this county, which is older by several years than the one he livs in, I can show him nine out of every ten farms under mortgage. It is not that it is Nebraska, but for the reason of nabobs at court who draw the strings while the common people dance—in other words, bankers who are allowed to hold a "corner" on money, while others contract the currency and manipulate affairs expressly to make hard times, so that farmers and everybody else must borrow money and fill the coffers of banker princes. Once I thought that borrowing money was only an epidemic that would pass away when it had run its course, but now I know it is the result of a conspiracy to rob and plunder the people who are willing and anxious to hold their noses on the grindstone while the members of their "party" turn the crank. Here in this neighborhood, within a radius of three miles, I can point out eleven empty farmhouses, some of them quite good houses for this country, and barns, with a windmill or two thrown in—farms mortgaged and people gone.

This is a sad illustration, but it is true, and can be duplicated in dozens of places in northwestern Nebraska.

I hav lately been honored with a copy of the new "Cosmian Hymnbook." To say that every Liberal in the land should hav the "Cosmian Hymnbook" would only be to reiterate what others hav said of other books, but it would be a fine thing nevertheless. I mean fine for all Liberals to hav the book, and that the book itself will be fine also.

Liberalism needs music to unite, harmonize, and elevate its members. The people in the churches know what a power their music is to draw the crowd. The grand church organ is the principal part of the church paraphernalia. It is the music as much as the mystery that holds the machinery together. As Brothers Bell, Burnham, Shaw, and Kelso, no doubt, often said in their palmiest Methodist days, "Now is the accepted time"—to prepare for the coming camp-meetings and summer gatherings, and remember that you want a song-book, and not be playing peek-a-boo over your neighbor's shoulder. Send to the Truth Seeker Company for one.

MARY BAIRD FINCH.

PORTSMOUTH, O., July 14, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: A few days since I attended the funeral of a loved and loving daughter, sister, and friend. She had died in the morning of young womanbood, and while the silvery rays were falling from the east. The services were held in the Second Presbyterian church, and were conducted by Rev. (?) C. L. Work. His discourse was fearful; it was the most cruel thing I ever listened to. He gave no consolation to the broken-hearted parents, to the weeping brothers and sisters, or to the sad friends who had collected to join in the last rites. No devil could hav done worse. In the course of his remarks he attacked the platform dance, and drew those (among whom were members of his own flock) who had recently attended over the coals, and predicted damnation to all who persisted in attending the merry-go-round. He said his "almighty friend," that is, the Presbyterian God, had fixed the life of each and all; none could shorten or lengthen their allotted time; and as for himself he did not desire to liv past the date fixed for his departure by his God. I am inclined to disbelieve this, for only a short time ago he was taken ill, and like sane people he had a physician called in. Why? He wanted to be himself again and liv. The man of medicin ministered to his wants, and he got well. By so doing he may hav thwarted the plans of the infinit Calvinistic. Does he not know that for every effect there is a cause, and for every cause an effect? The disease he was afflicted with had its origin, its cause, which was traced by the physician in attendance. Had he not been properly treated the effect would hav been different, and the probability is he would hav died. He certainly knows enough to know that a good dose of poison would kill him, and that fire would burn him, and water drown him. According to his idea the innocent man who dies on the gallows meets that terrible end justly, and in accordance with the will of his God. Frightful is the doctrin of the Presbyterian church. I cannot for the life of me see how a person calling himself a man can occupy a pulpit and advocate the five points of Calvinism.

Strange and wild are the thoughts which flash across the intellectual sphere of the average Christian. For instance: In walking around the national cemetery near Richmond, Va., where lie buried the Union soldiers who perished during the late Rebellion, you find some very funny epitaphs, of which this is a sample:

When I was young and in my prime,
It pleased the Lord to end my time.
And Jesus Christ, he did think best
To take me to a place of rest.

The Seventh Day Adventists are gaining ground in this locality. Up near Franklin Furnace are several families who are ardent followers. They never fail to work on Sunday, but on Saturdays they rest. This they claim is the right Sabbath. The preachers hav no love for them.

The prospects for a Liberal organization in this city are highly flattering. This winter will find them fully organized, with a firm grip on the torch of reason.

The other day I had the pleasure of meeting Mr. John Downes, of Steubenville, O. He is a highly intelligent man, and when I grasped his hand I thought, Of just such is the grand body of liberty-makers. He frequently writes for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I find his epistles all gems, dazzlers, as it were, in the crown of Freethinkers.

WILL S. ANDRES.

COLUMBUS, KAN., July 20, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Now that Mrs. Hayes is dead, and is, or is to be, in the Methodist heaven, and her praise is on the tongues of all orthodox, all Republicans, and especially all Methodists, I feel to express a few thoughts in connection with her and D. M. Bennett, whose praise is on the tongues of all truth-loving, God-hating—I mean the orthodox, Jewish, personal God—humanity-loving tongues. Ten years ago I did much traveling on foot over this county and pleaded in behalf of D. M. Bennett, for I was full of sympathy, and of moral indignation that the noblest Roman of us all, the great moral hero of justice and liberty, should be sent to prison by those who were vastly his inferiors in intellectual and moral power and manhood; who had outraged all just legal law and moral law. I circulated a petition and got five hundred names for the release of our beloved brother Bennett. I also wrote a private letter to the president, as earnest, logical, pathetic, and humane as my indignation and the "divinity stirring within me" impelled me to make it.

The United States attorney had said that "Cupid's Yokes" was not an obscene book; for the selling of that book Bennett was imprisoned; eminent lawyers had confirmed that decision, and President Hayes was of the same opinion. Why, then, with such a vast number of petitions and names and so many manly, humane, and unanswerable letters before him, did he, President Hayes, not exercise his individuality, and letting his own sense of justice and manhood coöperate with his official power, reprieve D. M. Bennett? It was chiefly because Mrs. Hayes, his wife, impelled by blind bigotry, zeal, and prejudice, used her prestige and influence of position, in conjunction with the whole orthodox church—for that administration was dominantly Methodist, as the present one is Presbyterian. All denominations and all the leading priests who advocate and pray to an avenging and inhuman God were against the president's reprieving D. M. Bennett, and thus he suffered—and thus he triumphed at last over his enemies, and thus also gave an impetus to truth and liberty in no other way attainable. Had Abraham Lincoln, with a moral backbone, or "Old Hickory," been president, "by the eternal," D. M. Bennett would hav been released as soon as the telegraph could hav spoken from Washington to Albany. Looking at the picture of Mrs. Hayes, I am impressed that as a whole she was far superior to the average of women in intellect and moral and spiritual power. It was her blind, perverted, and misused faith, her unwise and misdirected zeal, her pride and ambition to lead and giv her sectarian and Methodist proclivities full sway, that impelled her to plead with her husband and remonstrate with all the fervor and persistence of religious zeal and prejudice against his reprieving D. M. Bennett, who was greatly her superior in intellect, reason, and love of truth and humanity. I wish not to disparage or misrepresent Mrs. Hayes in any sense, and I know she had many noble qualities and did much good. We are all what we are by parentage, education, and environment. But it is hard for me to condone Mrs. Hayes for the part she played against one of the best and noblest men that ever lived. J. H. Cook.

Detroit, Mich., June 21, 1889.

Mr. Editor: In answer to Converse Close, of Grattan, Mich., in his article on "Poverty and Riches," permit me to state that he takes a one-sided view of the teachings of the Bible. This book says that he who runs may read, and the wayfaring man though a fool shall not err therein. He asks the question, Why is it that so many different creeds and sects exist that look to that book for their guide? and claims there are two hundred different sects who all claim that they are right, using this book as their guide. Now, the fact of the matter is that such a state of ignorance exists at the present time in regard to the Bible simply because the people hav not time to study it, or because they are indifferent about it. No man in his senses would affirm that the gospel preached to-day is the same as that taught by Jesus and the apostles eighteen hundred years ago. And yet we hav millions who do affirm it, and are not capable of seeing the difference. Think, and compare the results of conversion in the first century with the results of conversion to-day. In the first century when any were converted they went and sold all their possessions if they were rich, and laid them at the apostles' feet, and they lived as do Communists and had all things in common. This proves to my mind that the same religion is not preached to-day, or it would hav the same results, as Jesus taught his followers that they were all brethren. What is the effect of conversions at the present time? They are the result of superstitious fear and ignorance combined, and consequently they cannot bear any fruit. A good tree cannot bring forth corrupt fruit, neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit. Honesty is the first principle of religion. When the teachers of theology become honest they will leave their superstitions and turn to the Bible with their whole heart, believe in the promises made to Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, David, Solomon, and Jesus Christ, preached by the apostle Paul and all the rest of the apostles, and they will soon find how true it is that he who runs may read, and how difficult it is to err. The testimony that Jesus was born to be the king of the Jews has been perverted to a place beyond the skies, which is equivalent to nowhere. Our polytheism is a mixture of ancient and modern paganism. The religions of the nineteenth century affirm what they cannot prove. The Bible says, "Prove all things and hold fast that which is good," and, "The soul that sinneth it shall die." Theology teaches the very opposit. Jesus says, "When thou prayest, enter into thy closet and shut thy door." Theology exalts the man into a place where he may be seen and heard by all. Neither Jesus nor Moses taught the immortality of man. Immortality is a gift to be bestowed on those who are worthy, according to the New Testament, at some future time. The Bible says that he who will not work should not eat. But what do the bishops and prelates and preachers of all churches do? Do they earn an honest livelihood? Do they not rather shift the burden off their own shoulders, and lead a life of luxury and idleness at the expense of the toiler? If Jesus drove them out of the temple once he will hav to do it again before the sanctuary will be cleansed. That your readers will take the hint and examin the book with an honesty of purpose, that they may get just so far ahead of the church that she will never be able to catch up to them again, is the sincere wish of the writer. David Lookhart.

Purdy's Station, N. Y., July 11, 289.

Mr. Editor: At a revival meeting held last winter at the Methodist Episcopal church at Purdy's Station, the Rev. Mr. Wray, of Bedford, N. Y., told the following story:

At a conference of rabbis which once took place in Jerusalem, a certain Freshman, one of the most esteemed and learned rabbis, asked the members of the conference a few questions concerning the coming of the messiah. But as no one was able to answer his questions he began to study the subject himself, and after several months of conscientious labor came to the conclusion that Jesus of Nazareth was the real messiah. It is unnecessary to add that he abandoned Judaism and became a prominent worker for Christianity, and for many years preached in Canada.

So far, so good. Who is the authority for this tale and what has become of the ex-rabbi is unknown to me, as the Rev. Mr. Wray did not enlighten us on this subject. He only added that his son, Brother Jacob Freshman, is the pastor of a Hebrew-Christian church in New York. So I am inclined to think that the story must be credited to the son of the ex-rabbi. But here is another story, which Mr. Wray heard from Brother Jacob Freshman himself.

A young German Jew, a son of very wealthy parents and a man of great learning and intelligence, lost faith in the saving power of Judaism, and the problem of human destiny here and hereafter and the great question, What must we do to be saved? so terrified him that he indeed felt very miserable. His father could see no reason why his son, with all his wealth and luxury, should be unhappy. But the youth replied sadly: "Of what avail are the riches of the whole world if I shall lose my soul?" Finally he happened to read in a paper that Rabbi Freshman had found the messiah, and at once he started for Canada with the great hope that so soon as he shakes hands with the messiah his mental sufferings are ended. He undoubtedly thought that the ex-rabbi kept the messiah in a glass house on exhibition. But having arrived at the city where the Rev. Mr. Freshman lived, he learned to his great grief that the ex-rabbi was absent. He was so anxious to find the messiah that he could not wait till Mr. Freshman came home, and so he went to a Catholic priest. Indeed, one might think that no Catholic priest is to be found in Germany, happy land. The priest explained to him some of the Catholic mysteries and ceremonies. But the young Jew was indignant. "What do I care about such nonsense?" he exclaimed. "I want to save my soul." With a heavy heart he left the priest's house and concluded to wait for the only man who could show him the messiah. The blessed moment at last came. The ex-rabbi returned home and received the young Jew very cordially. His great show, however, was by no means a success. The Jew was not convinced. It seems that instead of keeping the messiah in a glass house, he kept him in an iron cage with the door always shut. At last, seeing that his arguments did not impress the Jew, he said: "Look here, my friend! You are a Hebrew scholar. So take your Hebrew Bible and read carefully the prophecies about the messiah, especially the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah, and then compare them with the events recorded in the New Testament, and if this will not convince you that Jesus Christ was the true messiah, then nothing will." The young Jew did so, and succeeded in finding the truth. He became converted, and is now a pillar of the church.

Good again. These stories ought to be published in tract form and scattered by the millions. Then not a Jew would remain in the whole world. But the question is, hav they any resemblance of truth, or are they pure fabrications ad majoram Dei gloriam? I cannot positivly express any opinion, as I hav not the honor of knowing Brother Jacob Freshman. But I think that Mr. A. Benjamin, who is now driving some more nails into Freshman's coffin, can tell us something about him and his father. Will he be kind enough to inform us through The Truth Seeker who Freshman's father really was, and if he has any right to call himself the son of a rabbi? Clemens P. Berylson.

Mr. Editor: Occasionally we find among newspaper managers throughout the country one that dares to print an article from the pen of a Freethinker. I inclose one of my production in reply to an extract from a sermon by a local minister. I made the assertion that the Alexandrian library was destroyed under the rule of Constantine, which is disputed by a Freethinker here. Am I correct? I am sure I hav seen it in history, but cannot recollect where it was. Would you please answer this for me?

I find Freethinkers rather numerous out here among the Rockies. Very truly yours, A Freethinker.

Editor of the New Empire: In Tuesday's issue of the New Empire I notice an extract from a sermon by the Rev. Mr. Thompson, which, though savoring too much of sophistry to mislead the thinker, needs a brief rejoinder, partly to warn the unwary and the credulous, and partly on account of the malevolent, bare, and uncalled-for assertions embodied in his discourse.

"The fool hath said in his heart there is no God," it seems was the basis of his sermon. Mr. Thompson charges the Atheist with the assertion, "There is no God," but most Atheists are Agnostics and simply say: "I believe there is no God." Belief does not constitute knowledge; and to call a man a fool because there has not been evidence enough produced to convince a matter-of-fact mind of the truth of an assertion is certainly unjust. The unbeliever has as good if not better grounds to say, "You are a fool for believing the utterances of a semi-civilized people of the past with such little evidence of the correctness of the statements." But the doubter does not do this. He respects the honest opinions of all. And though he dislikes superstition in any form, he does not malign the individuals of an order because they happen to be the victims of a deception. I cannot understand what he means by the "lower order of Atheists." It is an impossibility for an Atheist to be of a low order mentally. The mind that evolves from the narrow teachings of centuries, and takes a broader, a more humane and natural view of all that exists, is certainly expansiv and marked with at least a degree of power not manifested by the majority of those that are "strong in the faith." He uses the trite and threadbare epithet "scoffer" as applicable to Liberals because they sometimes moderately ridicule the puff and pomp of the pulpit expounders. Let me say right here, the Liberals deplore the credulity of the laity far more than the duplicity and maledictions of the clergy.

Mr. Thompson cites "man's limited knowledge" as a "reason" to show the folly of an Atheist and as an evidence of Theism.

It is claimed "God is infinit." Man is a finite being. It is impossible for the finite to comprehend the infinit, hence we can hav no conception of God. The Materialists claim matter is infinit and fills all space. Being finite we cannot comprehend the magnitude of it; but it is divisible, and we can at least view, discuss, and understand a part of it. Knowledge is gained only through the five senses. Something that cannot act upon at least one of these senses we can hav no knowledge of.

"Man's limited knowledge" indeed! This will do if applied to infinity. But if the reverend gentleman and myself happen to be under the painful ban of ignorance, we should not discourage investigators and attempt to banish research by applying such language to the grand old sages that hav unearthed sublime truths and suffered martyrdom to bring the world to the intellectual plane which it now occupies. Mr. Thompson asserts: "Atheism cannot be proved." It is not necessary to prove a negativ. The one that affirms shall prove. Suppose I should say, "Mr. Thompson, I saw a monster out in the Pacific ocean as gigantic as one of these mountains." He would reply, "I do not believe it." "Then, sir, if you cannot prove there is not one, then it is an evidence there is one." I hope the reverend gentleman can see the futility of his mode of philosophizing. He asks, "What is matter? What is mind? Force is a mystery. What is gravitation? What is light?" If the Materialist does not answer such questions in a twinkle the "faithful" swell up in a sort of pious puff and deepen the mystery by declaring there is a God. That is as far as they get. That ends all inquiry.

What is matter? It is all that is in existence—that which fills all space—the universe. We can hav no knowledge of anything but matter and its properties, because there is nothing else that can act upon the senses. What is mind? The usual definition is, "The intellectual or thinking power in man; the soul." (Soul here does not mean spirit.) This is good as far as it goes, but let me make an addition. It is a property of matter in a certain condition. Change the condition and the property is destroyed immediately. There is but one known form of matter to which this property is attached—an organized brain. According to our knowledge it is an absolute property of matter, hence without matter there can be no intellect. What is gravitation? It is force—an inherent property of matter inseparable from it. There is no such thing as force without matter, and where matter exists force is sure to attend. Matter is always in motion. Hence, its transmutation is as sure as its existence. What is light? A result of heat. It has been the opinion of scientists for some time that light, heat, and electricity are about the same thing only in a different form. Some modern writern claim—and very reasonably—oxygen is in the list. This latter theory has many strong points if one will stop to think. If I had time and space I could make my meaning more explicit, but I am compelled to hurry on.

"Something is, therefore something always was." Unconsciously he drifted on to the ground on which the Materialist stands—terra firma. Matter is indestructible; hence it could not be created. I hold this to be an axiom. The man that will impose upon his flock by stuffing their credulity with the idea that Atheists and Materialists believe in a chance universe is unfit to be a teacher of the people. Everything we behold is in a state of growth or in a state of decay. The elements of the dead transmutate to the elements of the living, and vice versa. Everything that is subject to growth is subject to decay that we see on this earth. By analogy may we not apply the same reasoning to the planets and bodies that exist in space? May not the birth of a new world be due to the death and decay of another, as well as the rank corn is due to the crop of clover you plowed under?

> That law that molds a tear,
> And bids it trickle from its source,
> That same law preserves the earth a sphere,
> And guides the planets in their course.

Paul said: "The world by wisdom knows not God." The Rev. W. H. Thomas, of Chicago, said: "I question whether or not it is possible for man and the human intellect ever to stand without the possibility of a doubt with reference to God. I never saw an argument tending to prove the existence of God that did not need another argument to uphold the first. Reason tries to show God and fails. It is the heart that perceives God, but doubt will ever remain on the part of the understanding." Several Chicago divines sanctioned what Mr. Thomas said.

It is plain that Mr. Thompson is in the rear of the ranks of progressiv Christians, if indeed he cares to progress at all.

"The Atheist says in his heart there is no God. The wish is father to the thought. He does not wish moral restraint." The falsity of the latter part of this assertion is so palpable it hardly needs refutation or comment. The Atheist relies solely upon himself for moral restraint. He needs no promis of future reward or threat of punishment to keep him in the line of rectitude. I would refer Mr. Thompson to the prisons in any part of the world. He will not find one inmate out of one hundred that is an Atheist. "Atheism would reproduce on American soil the scenes of 1793 in Paris. It would overthrow our Constitution, it would ruin commerce and the home." For rank falsity, consummate stupidity, and malevolent intent, this is certainly a "bonanza." The right reverend gentleman forgets that some of the immortal heroes of our Revolution—some of the fathers of our Constitution—are also fathers of much of the Atheism prevalent at the present day. Atheism emerges from Deism through investigation. We rejoice in the fact that some of our Revolutionary sires were Deists, doubters, and skeptics, else we would hav had a forced "God in our Constitution." Would Jefferson and Franklin overthrow our Constitution were they living? Would the man that wrote The Crisis overthrow the Constitution? Read that pamphlet, Mr. Thompson, and then judge. The man that wrote these words, "The world is my country; to do good my religion," we find amid the scenes of 1793. Not satisfied with his work in liberating the American colonies, he goes to France, and there risking his heart's blood he redresses the wrongs of the people. Their cause was his soul. By opposing the guillotin, he came near being guillotined himself.

For a model home, let me refer the gentleman to that of the greatest "scoffer," whose name is contaminated by the gush of all modern ranters—I mean Robert Ingersoll. The Atheist knows but one broad religion, the only true religion—the religion of humanity.

There has been more innocent blood shed over the religion of the Bible than any other one cause. For a long time it stifled all attempts at research and advancement. In its name the famous Alexandrian library was destroyed under the regime of Constantine. A Rustic of the Rockies.

Children's Corner.

Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Reverie.

A CHILD'S FACE IN A DREAM.

Ah! that face I know!
In the years long gone
I placed it 'neath the snow;
On its breast a white, white rose—
The heart o'erflows—
But, in accents sweet and mild,
Thus spake the little child:
"This is what we know,
One by one the roses blow.
Robed in crimson,
Or, in vestments white as snow,
Scattering their sweet perfume,
Above, around, below,
As they go.
This is what we know—
One by one the roses go,
And as they go,
Whence they came,
Or where they go,
Ah! we ne'er shall know."
Thus spake my little child,
Spite of my dream,
As it vanished from life's
Swiftly flowing stream;
And this is all we know,
And this is all we know.

Helen and the Bellman.

(FOR A CARELESS LITTLE GIRL.)

Come, O bellman, walk behind her!
For she loses all she can:
Hatpins, kerchiefs, ribbons bright,
Bags with 'broidery bedight,
Trifles rare from old Japan.
Ring, bellman, ring!
Ding, dong, ding!
Who can find them?

Come and gather,
Who would rather
Gather handkerchiefs than buy.
Gloves she'll scatter from the shop,
Pennies and half pennies drop.
Ring, bellman, ring!
Ding, dong, ding!
Who will find them?

Ring, bellman, loud and fast!
Helen's lost herself at last:
In a dream she's gone astray,
Or gathering wool down fancy's way.
Ring, bellman, ring!
Ding, dong, ding!
Who can find her?

The Little Bowery Boy.

I met a little Bowery boy;
He was ten years old, he said—
A keen-eyed child, with dirty face
And hair of fiery red.

"Sisters and brothers, little man,
How many may you be,
And from what country did you come?"
"We're Irish. Seven are we.

"Me bruder Mike, he's in a show
Up on de Bowery;
He is de noted tattooed Greek,
His name's Youripadee.

"Me sister Jane's in Fourteenth street,
She is de French glass-eater.
Her name is Alphonsine Le Grand,
Say, did ye ever meet her?

"I used to be de human fly,
But only stayed a week.
I go dead-head to all de shows
Just like I was a freak.

"Me brudder John's de German chap
Dat stretches out his skin.
He'll wrap his face up in his ears,
Dey call him Herr von Glin.

"Me brudder Larry has a snap,
Wid whiskers on his forehead,
An' he's de Booshian dog-face boy,
De whiskers, dey was borried.

"De beautiful Circassian girl
Up at de Grand street show,
Is sister Kate; an' little Chim's
De wild man of Borneo."

"And yet, my little man, you said
You are all Irish. Pray
How can that be?" "Come off de roof!
Oh, what a bloomin' jay!"

And then he called upon his mates;
They came with sticks and stones,
And had I not bestirred my stumps,
They would hav smashed my bones.

The Little Six.

[The recent Johnstown disaster, with its many instances of bravery and devotion, its various kinds of assistance promptly tendered, recalls the following interesting episode relating to a similar, though not so disastrous and widespread, horror.—ED. C. C.]

There were six of them—children—three boys and three girls. They lived in Pennsylvania, and doubtless are living there still. Reed White, Florence Howe, Lloyd and Mary Barton, Zoe Farrar, and Bertie Ensworth are their names. Now, we often read what the little ones are saying—the following sketch tells what they are doing. The eldest of these six children was but twelve years old when the good deed I am about to relate was done.

It was at the time of the Ohio floods about four years ago, and the valley of that river was nearly devastated of its cheery dwellings. These six children in Pennsylvania were very much distressed at the recital of the sufferings of the people in the valley of the Ohio. They lay awake nights thinking of the dear little children whose homes were desolated by the angry waters. Finally, they put their little heads together, and thought out a plan whereby they might help a very little the unfortunate people in the Ohio valley. They decided to giv an entertainment. They were familiar from babyhood with certain selections—many rhymes from "Mother Goose"—and they knew some little poems by heart, and also they could sing well certain ditties, comic and pathetic. In fact, they felt certain they had material enough for an evening's entertainment. But, in addition, they learned a short drama, and when all the parts were duly prepared and learned, the brave little six issued their invitations, and, dressed in their best, awaited the coming of their patrons with anxiously beating hearts and eager interest. They came by scores and cheerfully paid the price of admission—fifteen cents—at the door. And it is needless to say the people were well pleased with the performance. The drama, "Mother Goose" rhymes, and the songs were all applauded, the rhymes and songs receiving hearty encores. When the children, with Reed at the head as manager, counted up the proceeds of the entertainment, it was found that they had netted $51.25.

How to get this sum to the sufferers they did not know, and they held a meeting, did the six little performers, and gravely talked the matter over. It was, after much discussion, decided to send the money to the good editor of the Erie Dispatch (and the incidents I am relating are gathered from that paper), with a request that he would forward the same where it would do the greatest good. That gentleman immediately sent the amount to Miss Clara Barton, president of the Red Cross Association, who was then on her mission of love and mercy to the desolate hearts in the Ohio valley.

The story of the contribution touched her gentle heart, and, as she went about doing good, she carried the names of the six little children in her heart, and their gift in her purse till she should find some case to which it would be specially adapted. She wanted the money to benefit some "children who had wept on the banks of the river whose anger had swallowed their home."

The opportunity came at last. It was at a place called Cave in Rock a woman and her daughter came on board the steamer that carried aid to the stricken ones on its banks.

The two women, thinly clad, sad and sorrowful, told their story. The elder was the widow of a pilot who had perished two years before from overwork. He had left her with six children all dependent upon her for bread and meat. The children were like steps of stairs, the youngest a little baby girl. They had all done what they could and worked very hard after the father died to keep their little farm. But the floods came and two of their three horses had been lost. All but three of their thirty hogs died of cholera, many of their hens and chickens were destroyed, yet they did not despair, but toiled on.

Again the flood came and the mad waters rose and splashed into the very door, and they had to flee into an old log cabin near by that they used for a corn-crib. The wind and the storm swept over their house, and they watched it tearfully but hopefully. One morning they looked out on the rushing river in its wild march and saw it bearing away their dear old home with all their household goods. Then, indeed, did they sorrow—that mother and the six children clinging to her garments. But they wiped their eyes and made the best of the little they had left. They made the corn-crib tidy, and looked toward the future with courage. It was a pitiful sight—the brave woman and her six children smiling through tears, hopeful in dire misfortune, making the best of the trials that had come upon her, watching for the silver lining to the dark cloud.

Everything around seemed to forbid the starting of a new home from the wreck of the old one, and Miss Barton asked the mother if she wouldn't like to go back to her childhood's home in Indiana.

What do you think she said, that brave, hopeful mother?

"Here," she said, "I hav been happy. My children were born here. Here my husband died. Yonder is his grave. I wouldn't like to go away and leave him here alone. I would like to stay here near his grave. Out of the wreck of the old house I would like to build a little home, higher on the bank so that the floods would not reach it. We can make a crop this year; the land is ours."

All who listened cried in sympathy as she talked. The children smiled yes to all she said, and the remnant of the flock of hens in their clatter seemed to say, "Yes," too.

Dr. Hubbell, Miss Barton's agent, looked inquiringly at Miss Barton. "Here are six little children," he said.

Then the story of the six in Pennsylvania was told, and the mother was asked if the money they had sent, with another half hundred, would help get up the house.

The tears coursed over her cheeks. When she could speak she said, in trembling but hopeful tones: "With the aid of my good boys I can do it."

So the money was placed in her hands, and boxes of clothing and bedding was put at her disposal.

Miss Barton inquired if she would like to giv the new house an appropriate name when completed.

A bright smile illumined the worn, sad face, a smile such as had not shone there for many a weary day.

"It shall be called 'The Little Six,'" said the mother.

And away on the banks of the great river the house undoubtedly stands to-day, a cosy shelter to that mother and her six children, and a memento of the efforts of the other six children whose little hands and pitying hearts went out in such love and tenderness to the homeless and unfortunate on the banks of the rolling river.

From the kind and thoughtful act of the six children in Pennsylvania, hav started clubs of children in many places. Little helping hands, baby fingers even, hav joined in work to relieve the troubles and sorrows of other little ones less fortunate. From the little seed dropped by that one kindly act hav sprung the hardy plants that hav flowered into hope, love, joy, gratitude, courage, whose fragrance reaches far and wide, and blesses everywhere it goes.

The Flying Machine Problem.

The reason of this wonderful effectivness of the animal machine is obvious. See how this machine has been gradually perfected throughout infinit ages, especially in birds. During the whole geological history of the earth this machine has been steadily improving in structure of skeleton, energy of muscle, and rapidity of combustion of fuel, by struggle for life and survival of only the swiftest, the most energetic, and the hottest-blooded, until an almost incredible intensity is reached in birds. Moreover, in them everything is sacrificed to the supreme necessity of flight. Viscera, skeleton, legs, head, all are made as small and light as possible to make room for the great pectoral muscles working the wings. Add to this the exquisit structure of the wings and feathers, adapting them for the greatest effectivness, and we must admit that a bird is an incomparable model of a flying machine.

No machine that we may hope to devise, for the same weight of machine, fuel, and directing brain, is half so effectiv. And yet this machine, thus perfected through infinit ages by a ruthless process of natural selection, reaches its limit of weight at about fifty pounds! I said, "weight of machine, fuel, and directing brain." Here is another prodigious advantage of the natural over the artificial machine. The flying animal is its own engineer, the flying machine must carry its engineer. The directing engineer in the former (the brain) is perhaps an ounce, in the latter it is one hundred and fifty pounds. The limit of the flying animal is fifty pounds. The smallest possible weight of a flying machine, with its necessary fuel and engineer, even without freight or passengers, could not be less than three hundred or four hundred pounds.

Now, to complete the argument, put these three indisputable facts together: 1. There is a low limit of weight, certainly not much beyond fifty pounds, beyond which it is impossible for an animal to fly. Nature has reached this limit, and with her utmost effort has failed to pass it. 2. The animal machine is far more effectiv than any we may hope to make; therefore the limit of the weight of a successful flying machine cannot be more than fifty pounds. 3. The weight of any machine constructed for flying, including fuel and engineer, cannot be less than three or four hundred pounds. Is it not demonstrated that a true flying machine, self-raising, self-sustaining, self-propelling, is physically impossible?—Popular Science Monthly.

Aberdeen English.

Socrates excelled in the art of asking questions, because he put his questions in words easily understood. An English clergyman and a lowland Scotsman, examining an Aberdeen school, failed, because they did not adopt the Socratic method.

"Would you prefer to speer the boys, or that I should speer them?" asked the master of the school. The Englishman, being told that speer meant to question, desired the master to proceed. He did so, and the boys answered many questions as to the exodus of the Israelites from Egypt.

"I would like to speer the boys," then said the clergyman. "Boys, how did Pharaoh die?" Not a boy answered.

"I think, sir," said the Lowlander, "that the boys don't understand your English accent. Let me try what I can make of them." In the broadest Scotch he asked: "Hoo did Phawraoh dee?" Again a dead silence.

"I think, gentlemen," said the master, "you can't speer these boys; I'll show you how to do it." Then turning to the scholars: "Fat cam to Phawraoh at his hinder end?"

"He was drooned," answered the boys.

The master explained that in the Aberdeen dialect "to dee" means to die a natural death; hence the perplexity of the boys, who knew that Pharaoh did not die in his bed.

Correspondence.

PHILADELPHIA, July 23, 1889.

MY DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav been reading the Children's Corner of THE TRUTH SEEKER for many weeks. I like the letters and also the pictures, as pa explains them every week to us. I hav three other sisters who like the pictures. Pa takes all the Liberal papers. He takes us to the hall every Sunday; he is secretary of the meeting. We hav a pet bird. It is a robin, and such a good singer he wakes us up in the morning. Pa says he is one year older than I am, and I was eleven last month. As this is the first letter I ever wrote, I hope to see it in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I shall be very proud to show it to my sisters. Before I close I wish to say we love your "Story Hour" very much. What do you think of my writing at my age? From your loving young Freethinker, ELEANOR LONGFORD.

[Eleanor writes very well for one of her age—a strong, good hand. We are much obliged for her letter, and hope she will write again—also her sisters, if old enough.—ED. C. C.]

Obituary.

On July 22d, at Howard, Kan., Ulysses A. Buckingham ceased to move amongst us and joined the quiet dead. His illness was of short duration. His health had not been good, but we saw no cause for alarm until about thirty-six hours before his death. His disease was uræmia. Mr. Buckingham was born in the town of Essex, Conn., in 1843, and was nearly forty-six years of age. He was an Agnostic without "variableness or shadow of turning." With his mantle of Infidelity wrapped about him, he calmly faced the end of all things terrestrial, and gave to the world another proof that the presence of Charon and his boat is no cause for alarm to a mind supported by the revelations of science. Mr. Buckingham possessed warm and generous sympathies. He was an affectionate husband and a kind parent. He was an activ worker in the present labor reform. He gave with an ample hand to all benevolent reforms. Howard mourns the loss of one of her best citizens, and Liberalism one of its substantial pillars.

P. Van Hyatt.

The Sheath of Custom.

Every human being grows up inside a sheath of custom, which enfolds it as the swathing clothes enfold the infant. The sacred customs of one's early home, how fixed and immutable they appear to the child! It surely thinks that all the world in all times has proceeded on the same lines which bound its tiny life. It regards a breach of these rules (some of them, at least) as a wild step in the dark, leading to unknown dangers. The elders hav always said (and, indeed, it seems only reasonable) that by this time of day everything has been so thoroughly worked over, that the best methods of ordering our life—food, dress, domestic practices, social habits—hav long ago been determined. If so, why these divergences in the simplest and most obvious matters? And then one thing after another givs way. The sacred, world-wide customs in which we are bred turn out to be only the practices of a small or narrow caste or class; or they prove to be confined to a very limited locality, and must be left behind when we set out on our travels; or they belong to the tenets of a feeble sect; or they are just the products of one age in history and no other.

Are there really no natural boundaries? Has not our life anywhere been founded on reason and necessity, but only on arbitrary customs? What is more important than food, yet in what human matter are there more arbitrary divergences of practice? The Scotch Higblander flourishes on oatmeal, which the English Sheffield iron-worker would rather starve than eat; the fat snail which the Roman country gentleman once so prized now crawls unmolested in English or American gardens; rabbits are tabooed in Germany; frogs are unspeakable in England; sauerkraut is detested in France; many races and gangs of people are quite certain they would die if deprived of meat; others think spirits of some kind a necessity, while to others again both these things are an abomination.

Every district has its local practices in food, and the peasants look with the greatest suspicion on any new dish, and can rarely be induced to adopt it. Though it has been abundantly proved that many of the fungi are excellent eating, such is the force of custom that the mushroom alone is ever publicly recognized, while curiously enough it is said that in some other countries where the claims of other agarics are allowed the mushroom itself is not used. Finally, I feel myself—and the gentle reader probably feels the same—that I would rather die than subsist on insects, such is the deep-seated disgust we experience toward this class of food. Yet it is notorious that many races of respectable people adopt a diet of this sort, and only lately a book has been published giving a detail of excellent provender of the kind we habitually overlook—nasty morsels of caterpillars and beetles, and so forth.

And, indeed, when one comes to think of it, what can it be but prejudice which causes one to eat the periwinkle and reject the land snail, or to prize the lively prawn and proscribe the cheerful grasshopper? Why do we sit on chairs instead of on the floor, as the Japanese do, or on cushions like the Turks? It is custom, and perhaps it suits with our other customs. The more we look into our life and consider the immense variety of habit in every department of it—even under conditions to all appearances exactly similar—the more are we impressed by the absence of any serious necessity in the forms we ourselvs are accustomed to. Each race, each class, each section of the population, each unit even, vaunts its own habits of life as superior to the rest as the only true and legitimate forms, and peoples and classes will go to war with each other in their assertion of their own special belief and practices, but the question that rather presses upon the ingenuous and inquiring mind is whether any of us hav got hold of much true life at all.—Home Journal.

Remsburg as a Lecturer.

The Cedar county (Neb.) Nonpariel contains the following notice of J. E. Remsburg's lectures recently given at Hartington, Neb.:

By an oversight we failed to mention last week the lecture, "False Claims," given the previous Friday evening by Mr. J. E. Remsburg, one of the most widely known Freethought orators in America. A fair audience greeted him, but not so large a one as the eminent gentleman and his lecture were entitled to. Suffice to say, that from a Radical, or Infidel standpoint, the lecture was a good one, and to those who do not believe in the Bible was a rare treat. Church-members did not turn out very numerously, but we should think that all thinking people would hav a desire to hear all sides to all questions.

The Freethinkers of Hartington were so well pleased with his address that immediately after its close they made arrangements for his return to Hartington to giv them three more lectures.

He lectured all last week in Yankton, returning here on Saturday. In the evening he lectured upon Thomas Paine, giving his history, his works, his beliefs, and giving quotations from many eminent men, chief among whom were the first five presidents of the United States, besides a number of other of our presidents (including Lincoln), paying high tribute to Paine. Thomas Jefferson, while president, sent a government vessel to Europe, to be at the service of Paine, on his return to this country. Mr. Remsburg also cited history, showing how the brightest minds of the world hav paid tribute to the works and memory of Paine, who believed in doing unto others as he wished to be done by, and yet was not a "Christian." This noble man was persecuted while alive, and has been decried as a drunkard and immoral wretch by the church ever since!

The lecture Sunday afternoon was "Bible Morals;" Sunday evening he gave us "The Sunday Question." The afternoon lecture was not so well attended as it should hav been, but the evening lecture was more largely attended. Space forbids an extended mention but, suffice to say, this series of lectures has set many to thinking, and the people to discussing. Discussion brings light, and hence good will result from this series of lectures.

Last Monday evening, as per announcement, the Rev. Father Loecker delivered a lecture at Lemon's hall in refutation of "False Claims" by Mr. Remsburg. The hall was filled and the reverend gentleman received marked attention. He argued from the standpoint of Christianity, not particularly from the Catholic standpoint. The lecture was interesting, showing Mr. Loecker to be well versed, and that he had given much time and thought to the preparation of his lecture. Beginning at 8:30 he did not close till 11:30. Notwithstanding the lecture was well worthy of close attention, it was too long by half. It would hav given far better satisfaction had it been divided into two lectures, and he would hav had large audiences both evenings. The lecture was an able presentation of the question from a Christian standpoint. The Infidels who had listened to Mr. Remsburg took front seats, willing and anxious to hear the Rev. Mr. Loecker, and hav their faith shaken in their anti-Bible views, if it could be done. The Infidels showed that they were willing to hear both sides of the question, but we noticed that the church-members were not so anxious to turn out to the lectures of Mr. Remsburg and hear both sides. The Nonpareil believes in hearing all the evidence, and then in sifting that evidence. In no other way can a case be fairly tried, or a just opinion formed.

News of the Week.

THE Cincinnati saloonkeepers who attempted open defiance of the Sunday law hav given up.

AT Warsaw, Ill., an epidemic resembling dysentery has appeared, and caused about a score of deaths.

MINNEAPOLIS estimates its population at 235,000

IN Scotland the workers are gradually securing short hours.

RECENT cyclones hav been at Prague, Minn., and Lebanon, Ind.

A RECENT fire at Lu Chow, China, destroyed twelve hundred lives.

THE Vanderbilts hav secured control of the Chesapeake & Ohio railway.

THE latest statistics place the lives lost at Johnstown at six thousand.

ITALIAN railway hands at Pittsburgh, Pa., struck on the 1st, and hav rioted.

THE German emperor was received in England with august ceremonies on the 2d.

THE 1892 exposition is being grasped for by all the big cities east of the Mississippi.

PRIZEFIGHTER Sullivan has been arrested in New York and carried to Mississippi for trial.

BY a recent overflow of Shuganinga creek, Kan., Topeka and suburbs were flooded.

THE Austrian army is being increased.

THE destitution of the striking Illinois miners is shocking. They gladly scramble for horseflesh when they can get it.

A WEEK of heavy rains in the Eastern states has done much damage by flooding and wrecking buildings, and spoiling crops.

THE Chippewas hav ceded between 3,000,000 and 4,000,000 acres in Minnesota, containing the most extensiv and valuable pine forest in the Northwest.

SPOKANE FALLS, Wash., took fire on the 4th at 7.00 P.M., and twenty-five business blocks were consumed, with a loss of one life and $14,000,000 or $15,000,000.

THE international Socialist congress at Paris demands the eight-hour labor day, one holiday a week, and the suppression of labor by children under fourteen.

AT Cincinnati, on the 3d, Judge Ermston held that a barber's shop in a hotel is not a necessity on Sunday, and fined the barber of the Gibson House $2 and costs. This was a test case.

THE eminent medical man Brown-Sequard proclaims the discovery of an elixir of life that will restore youth, and Dr. Hammond, an eminent physician of New York, says he has tried it on patients with success; but other doctors scoff at it.

ON the 5th sufficient signatures were obtained to secure the cession of the South Dakota Sioux reservation, containing 11,000,000 acres, which will soon be opened. The tract extends from Missouri to the Black Hills and then north; it embraces, likewise, a part of the fertil Winnebago-Crow-Creek reservation on the east bank of the Missouri river, south of Pierre. The area of this great tract is equal to that of New Hampshire and Massachusetts combined. Three rivers run through it, and the valleys are of wonderful fertility. Since the extirpation of the gregarious bison, no animals, beyond a few beavers, are found in the area, although the grass is luxuriant in its growth, and plenty of water is found there, both inviting herbivorous animals. These 11,000,000 acres will afford farms for not less than 75,000 families, and, judging by the settlement of Oklahoma, it will require much less than seventy days—possibly hours—for its complete settlement, and then leave thousands of disappointed ones to return to the four quarters whence they came.

LOOKED AT FROM ANOTHER STANDPOINT.

And the sun stood still, and the moon stayed, until the people had avenged themselvs upon their enemies. Is not this written in the book of Jasher? So the sun stood still in the midst of heaven, and hasted not to go down about a whole day.—Joshua x, 13.

Gems of Thought.

FROM the days of Anaxagoras, who got into trouble for propounding a physical theory of the sun, down to our own time, men hav resented explanations of what they hav chosen to consider beyond or above explanation.—Popular Science Monthly.

WHEN a new fact is found it is generally denied, resisted, and calumniated by the conservativs until denial becomes absurd, and then they accept it with the statement that they always supposed it was true. —Ingersoll.

THE first nation in Europe that abolished slavery in the colonies (France in 1793) did in the same session abolish Christianity, and when Christianity was restored slavery came back also.—T. W. Higginson.

JEHOVAH himself told his chosen people that they might "buy their bondmen and bondwomen of the heathen round about, and that they should be their bondmen and their bondwomen forever." So all that Jehovah meant by the commandment, "Thou shalt not steal," was that one Hebrew should not steal from another Hebrew, but that all Hebrews might steal from the people of any other race or creed.—Ingersoll.

THE Jews hav always expected a deliverer; but this deliverer is for them and not for us; they expect a deliverer who shall render them masters of the Christians. And we hope that the messiah will unite the Christians and Jews together. With regard to this great event, their opinion is precisely the contrary of ours.—Voltaire.

THE best surviving evidence we now hav respecting this affair is the Jews. They are regularly descended from the people who lived in the time this resurrection and ascension is said to hav happened, and they say, it is not true. It has long appeared to me a strange inconsistency to cite the Jews as a proof of the truth of the story. It is just the same as if a man were to say, I will prove the truth of what I have told you, by producing the people who say it is false.—Paine.

THE true test of civilization is, not the census, nor the size of cities, nor the crops—no, but the kind of man the country turns out.—Emerson.

A BAD government, bad laws, or laws badly administered, are, indeed, extremely injurious at the time, but can produce no permanent mischief; in other words, they may harm a country, but can never ruin it. As long as the people are sound, there is life, and while there is life, there will be reaction. In such case, tyranny provokes rebellion, and despotism causes freedom. But if the people are unsound, all hope is gone, and the nation perishes.—Buckle's History of Civilization.

A PERSON of great intellectual activity is prone to attribute to others an equal penetration into things to that which he has himself; he does not dare to speculate sufficiently on the stupidity of mankind.—Westminster Review.

THE savage looks upon certain unhewn stones as deities, and worships them accordingly. It is very difficult to make out what his ideas in doing this are, and so, too, with respect to many other elements of his worship, it is very hard to understand what goes on in his mind, just because there is not much that does go on there. He reflects but little or not at all. Involuntarily we look for too much depth in him. . . . The lowest stage of religion that we can discover is generally called fetichism, sometimes animism. Its characteristic is the worship of all manner of miscellaneous objects that happen to make an impression on its votaries.—The Bible for Learners.

EVERYWHERE hav the perfidious ministers of revealed religion been either the avowed or the secret enemies of reason, because they always found reason in opposition to their views. They hav everywhere decried it, fearing it would destroy their empire, by discovering their plots and the futility of their fables.—D'Holbach.

Every fact is an enemy of the church.—Ingersoll.

WHO shall number the patient and earnest seekers after truth, from the days of Galileo until now, whose lives hav been embittered and their good name blasted by the mistaken zeal of bibliolaters? Who shall count the host of weaker men whose sense of truth has been destroyed in the effort to harmonize impossibilities—whose life has been wasted in the attempt to force the generous new wine of science into the old bottles of Judaism, compelled by the outcry of the same strong party? It is true that if philosophers hav suffered, their cause has been amply avenged. Extinguished theologians lie about the cradle of every science as the strangled snakes beside that of Hercules; and history records that whenever science and orthodoxy hav been fairly opposed, the latter has been forced to retire from the lists, bleeding and crushed, if not annihilated; scotched, if not slain. But orthodoxy is the Bourbon of the world of thought.—Huxley.

I BELIEVE in the gospel of education, of cheerfulness, of justice and intelligence.—Ingersoll.

Odds and Ends.

THE good Samaritan helps the unfortunate wayfarer without asking how he intends to vote.—Delaware County Advocate.

THE Sunday closing movement is gaining ground rapidly. Even churches are observing the custom.—Yonkers Statesman.

"WHAT'S the matter, little girl?" "I'm crying because my mamma has just gone to heaven." "Oh, but p'r'aps she hasn't."—Life.

"WHAT makes you so cold, Eve?" inquired Adam solicitously. "I rather think," she replied, "that it is due to the late fall."—Hotel Mail.

"HUSBAND," said the wife of a young clergyman, "read me one of your sermons. I feel dreadfully wakeful to-night, and I wish to sleep."

THE Easton Free Press says that Joshua was the first man who ever stopped the daily sun. We suppose he did so because the war news didn't suit him.

A NOTORIOUS miser, having heard a very eloquent charity sermon, exclaimed: "This sermon strongly proves the necessity of alms. I hav almost a mind to turn beggar."

OMAHA teacher: "Can any of the class explain to me why the way of the transgressor is so hard?" Omaha spark: "I guess it's 'cause it's traveled so much."—World-Herald.

IF you want to see a man struggle to do several things at once, just watch him put on his overcoat and rubbers with his head bowed down while the minister is pronouncing the benediction.

PARSON: "Did you ever experience a revival of religion, sir?" Traveling man: "Yes, once, on board ship, in a storm. It looked as if we might go to the bottom any minute. Even the cook prayed!"

"MY good woman," said the evangelist, as he offered her a tract, "hav you got the gospel here?" "No, sir, we havn't," replied the old crone, "but they've got it awfully down in Beaver Swamp."

TOMMY: "Mamma, why did they put Monday next to Sunday?" Mamma: "Don't trouble me now, dear; I'm sure I don't know." Tommy (after a pause): "Was it because cleanliness is next to godliness?"

IN front of the saloon: "Yes, mum, your husband's in there throwing dice for the beer with Rev. Father MacMoriarty; I told him you wanted to see him an' he said for you to go home an' not be breakin' up a church conference!"

SMITH and Jones were at the menagerie, and the conversation turned on Darwin's theory. "Look at that monkey," said Smith; "think of its being an undeveloped human!" "Human!" said Jones contemptuously, "it's no more human than I am."

A COLORED man applied to a gentleman for whom he worked to release him from a certain agreement, so he could go South. "What do you want to go South for, Uncle Davy?" "Cos I'se called to a church down dar." "Called to a church?" "Yissah, I dunno whedder I be de pasture aw de sextant aw de vestureman, but I's sumfin."

AN ancient headstone in the old burying-ground at West Lynn, Mass., bears the following inscription: "God took the good, too good to stay; and left the bad, too bad to take away." The surviving relativs were highly flattered, to say the least.

A CLERGYMAN and one of his elderly parishioners were walking on the ice one day, when the old man slipped and fell. "Ah?" shouted the clergyman, "the wicked shall stand on slippery places." The old gentleman looked at the parson a moment and said, "I see they do, but I am blasted if I can."

A LADY in Connecticut not long since visited a brother who resides in a distant city, taking her daughter with her. Fatigued with the long ride, the child was waiting to retire in the early evening. "You must wait till your uncle prays." "I didn't know that he prayed; I thought he was a Democrat."

"A CHARGE to keep I hav!" sweetly sang old Deacon Skinner, of Arkansas, as he loaded the shotgun heavily and lay in wait near a spring for a neighbor against whom he had a grudge, and, who was coming down the lane for a pail of water. "There is a fountain filled with blood!" hummed the deacon pleasantly, as he shouldered his gun and strolled home, after making an admirable shot.

Two sectarians were once disputing so loudly on the subject of religion that they awoke a big dog, which had been sleeping on the hearth before them, and he forthwith barked most furiously. An old skeptic present, who had been quietly sipping his tea while the disputants were talking, gave the dog a kick and exclaimed: "Hold your tongue, you silly brute! You know no more about it than they do."

AT a christening the other day the aged minister spoke a few words of counsel to the young parents: "Watch over this child with unceasing care. Choose his companions wisely and see that he is always surrounded by uplifting influences. If you train him to walk in the path of rectitude, he may become a George Washington or an Abraham Lincoln. What are you going to name him?" "Jane," said the mother.—Philadelphia Press.

IN the good old days when a flogging was considered means of grace, and anniversary processions, picnics, and Christmas trees were in the distant future, a boy was asked by his Sunday-school teacher: "John, how many Gods are there?" "Two." (Sternly): "How many?" "Three, sir." "John, how many Gods are there?" "Four, sir." At five the flogging commenced and continued, while John arose rapidly and by regular progression to ten. Beyond this he refused to go, and was finally sent home. As he dragged his slow length along he met a school-boy on his way to the same school. "Going to that Sunday-school?" "Yes." "You are, are you? Well, how many Gods are there?" "One," stoutly answered the boy. "One," chuckled John; "go on, my boy. Go up there with your one God, and a good time you'll hav of it. I had ten, and they flogged me nearly to death."

IN the year 1872, there was living in the city of R—— a priest by the name of Father B., assistant pastor of the Independent Catholic church, and recently from the land of the shamrock. He was of a very social disposition, and much given to making priestly calls on a Mrs. Sullivan. During his visit he saw a picture of George Washington hanging on the wall. "Whose picture is that?" says Father B. "Shure, that is Washington's," says Mrs. S. "Take him down out of that and put him down cellar out of sight," said Father B. The "father of his country" was instantly consigned to a dark corner of the cellar, to keep company with the Yankee rats and mice. "How dare you hang a heretic by the side of St. Patrick and St. Bridget?" says Father B. THE South Dakota state constitution is three times as long as the Constitution of the United States. This is owing to the numerous committees appointed by the convention that framed the constitution. Nearly every subject was referred to a separate committee, and as each committee insisted on having its report incorporated in the constitution, the result is a lengthy and cumbersome document. The constitution provides that the bonded indebtedness shall not exceed $800.000. In the settlement with North Dakota South Dakota assumed liabilities to the amount of $700,000. The constitution also forbids counties or municipalities extending aid to railroads or other public enterprises, and fixes the salaries of state officers as follows: governor, $2,500; attorney-general, $1,000; supreme court judges, $2,500, and treasurer $1,800. All of the state officers are to be elected this fall except circuit and supreme judges. The legislature will be composed of forty-three senators and one hundred and twenty representativs. The amendments to be submitted to a vote at the election for state officers are for or against minority representation and constitutional prohibition of the liquor traffic. The temporary seat of government will also be chosen at this time.

Agnosticism and Christianity.—Concluded.

From the Nineteenth Century.

Again, when I passed by the topic of the speeches of Jesus on the cross, it appears that I could hav had no other motiv than the dictates of my nativ evasivness. An ecclesiastical dignitary may hav respectable reasons for declining a fencing-match "in sight of Gethsemane and Calvary," but an ecclesiastical "Infidel!" Never. It is obviously impossible that, in the belief that "the greater includes the less," I, having declared the gospel evidence in general, as to the sayings of Jesus, to be of questionable value, thought it needless to select, for illustration of my views, those particular instances which were likely to be most offensiv to persons of another way of thinking. But any supposition that may hav been entertained that the old familiar tones of the ecclesiastical war-drum will tempt me to engage in such needless discussion had better be renounced. I shall do nothing of the kind. Let it suffice that I ask my readers to turn to the twenty-third chapter of Luke (revised version), verse thirty-four, and he will find in the margin:

> Some ancient authorities omit: "And Jesus said, Father, forgiv them, for they know not what they do."

So that, even as late as the fourth century, there were ancient authorities, indeed some of the most ancient and weightiest, who either did not know of this utterance, so often quoted as characteristic of Jesus, or did not believe it had been uttered.

Many years ago, I received an anonymous letter, which abused me heartily for my want of moral courage in not speaking out. I thought that one of the oddest charges an anonymous letter-writer could bring. But I am not sure that the plentiful sowing of the pages of the article with which I am dealing with accusations of evasion, may not seem odder to those who consider that the main strength of the answers with which I hav been favored (in this review and elsewhere) is devoted not to anything in the text of my first paper, but to a note which occurs at page 171.* In this I say:

> Dr. Wace tells us: "It may be asked how far we can rely on the accounts we possess of our Lord's teachings on these subjects." And he seems to think the question appropriately answered by the assertion that it "ought to be regarded as settled by M. Renan's practical surrender of the adverse case."

I requested Dr. Wace to point out the passages of M. Renan's works in which, as he affirms, this "practical surrender" (not merely as to the age and authorship of the gospels, be it observed, but as to their historical value) is made, and he has been so good as to do so. Now let us consider the parts of Dr. Wace's citation from Renan which are relevant to the issue:

> The author of this gospel [Luke] is certainly the same as the author of the Acts of the apostles. Now the author of the Acts seems to be a companion of St. Paul—a character which accords completely with St. Luke. I know that more than one objection may be opposed to this reasoning; but one thing, at all events, is beyond doubt, namely, that the author of the third gospel and of the Acts is a man who belonged to the second apostolic generation, and this suffices for our purpose.

This is a curious "practical surrender of the adverse case." M. Renan thinks that there is no doubt that the author of the third gospel is the author of the Acts—a conclusion in which I suppose critics generally agree. He goes on to remark that this person seems to be a companion of St. Paul, and adds that Luke was a companion of St. Paul. Then, somewhat needlessly, M. Renan points out that there is more than one objection to jumping, from such data as these, to the conclusion that "Luke" is the writer of the third gospel. And, finally, M. Renan is content to reduce that which is "beyond doubt" to the fact that the author of the two books is a man of the second apostolic generation. Well, it seems to me that I could agree with all that M. Renan considers "beyond doubt" here, without surrendering anything, either "practically" or theoretically.

Dr. Wace (Nineteenth Century, March, p. 363) † states that he derives the above citation from the preface of the fifteenth edition of the "Vie de Jésus." My copy of "Les Evangiles," dated 1877, contains a list of Renan's "Œuvres Complètes," at the head of which I find "Vie de Jésus," fifteenth edition. It is, therefore, a later work than the edition of the "Vie de Jésus" which Dr. Wace quotes. Now "Les Evangiles," as its name implies, treats fully of the questions respecting the date and authorship of the gospels; and anyone who desired, not merely to use M. Renan's expressions for controversial purposes, but to giv a fair account of his views in their full significance, would, I think, refer to the later source.

If this course had been taken, Dr. Wace might hav found some as decided expressions of opinion in favor of Luke's authorship of the third gospel as he has discovered in "The Apostles." I mention this circumstance because I desire to point out that, taking even the strongest of Renan's statements, I am still at a loss to see how it justifies that large-sounding phrase "practical surrender of the adverse case."

For, on p. 438 of "Les Evangiles," Renan speaks of the way in which Luke's "excellent intentions" hav led him to torture history in the Acts; he declares Luke to be the founder of that "eternal fiction which is called ecclesiastical history;" and, on the preceding page, he talks of the "myth" of the ascension—with its mise en scène voulue. At p. 435, I find Luc, ou l'auteur quel qu'il soit du troisième evangile [Luke, or whoever may be the author of the third gospel]; at p. 280, the accounts of the passion, the death, and the resurrection of Jesus are said to be pue historiques [little historical]; at p. 283, La valeur historique du troisième evangile est sûrement moindre que celles des deux premiers [the historical value of the third gospel is surely less than that of the first two].

A Pyrrhic sort of victory for orthodoxy this "surrender!" And, all the while, the scientific student of theology knows that the more reason there may be to believe that Luke was the companion of Paul, the more doubtful becomes his credibility, if he really wrote the Acts. For, in that case, he could not fail to hav been acquainted with Paul's account of the Jerusalem conference, and he must hav consciously misrepresented it. We may next turn to the essential part of Dr. Wace's citation (Nineteenth Century, p. 365)* touching the first gospel:

> St. Matthew evidently deserves peculiar confidence for the discourses. Here are "the oracles"—the very notes taken while the memory of the instruction of Jesus was living and definit.

M. Renan here expresses the very general opinion as to the existence of a collection of "logia," having a different origin from the text in which they are imbedded, in Matthew. "Notes" are somewhat suggestiv of a short-hand writer, but the suggestion is unintentional, for M. Renan assumes that these "notes" were taken, not at the time of the delivery of the "logia," but subsequently, while (as he assumes) the memory of them was living and definit; so that, in this very citation, M. Renan leaves open the question of the general historical value of the first gospel, while it is obvious that the accuracy of "notes," taken, not at the time of delivery, but from memory, is a matter about which more than one opinion may be fairly held. Moreover, Renan expressly calls attention to the difficulty of distinguishing the authentic "logia" from later additions of the same kind (Les Evangiles, p. 201). The fact is, there is no contradiction here to that opinion about the first gospel which is expressed in Les Evangiles (p. 175).

> The text of the so-called Matthew supposes the preëxistence of that of Mark, and does little more than complete it. He completes it in two fashions—first, by the insertion of those long discourses which gave their chief value to the Hebrew gospels; then by adding traditions of a more modern formation, results of successiv developments of the legend, and to which the Christian consciousness already attached infinit value.

M. Renan goes on to suggest that besides "Mark," "pseudo-Matthew" used an Aramaic version of the gospel originally set forth in that dialect. Finally, as to the second gospel (Nineteenth Century, p. 365):†

> He [Mark] is full of minute observations, proceeding, beyond doubt, from an eye-witness. There is nothing to conflict with the supposition that this eye-witness . . . was the apostle Peter himself, as Papias has it.

Let us consider this citation also by the light of Les Evangiles:

> This work, although composed after the death of Peter, was, in a sense, the work of Peter; it represents the way in which Peter was accustomed to relate the life of Jesus (p. 116).

M. Renan goes on to say that, as a historical document, the gospel of Mark has a great superiority (p. 116), but Mark has a motiv for omitting the discourses; and he attaches a "pueril importance" to miracles (p. 117). The gospel of Mark is less a legend than a biography written with credulity (p. 118). It would be rash to say that Mark has not been interpolated and retouched (p. 120).

If anyone thinks that I hav not been warranted in drawing a sharp distinction between "scientific theologians" and "counsel for creeds;" or that my warning against the too ready acceptance of certain declarations as to the state of biblical criticism was needless; or that my anxiety as to the sense of the word "practical" was superfluous, let him compare the statement that M. Renan has made a "practical surrender of the adverse case" with the facts just set forth. For what is the adverse case? The question, as Dr. Wace puts it, is, "It may be asked how far can we rely on the accounts we possess of our Lord's teaching on these subjects." It will be obvious, that M. Renan's statements amount to an adverse answer—to a "practical" denial that any great reliance can be placed on these accounts. He does not believe that Matthew, the apostle, wrote the first gospel; he does not profess to know who is responsible for the collection of "logia," or how many of them are authentic; though he calls the second gospel the most historical, he points out that it is written with credulity, and may hav been interpolated and retouched; and, as to the author quel qu'il soit of the third gospel who is to "rely on the accounts" of a writer who deserves the cavalier treatment which "Luke" meets with at M. Renan's hands?

I repeat what I hav already more than once said, that the question of the age and the authorship of the gospels has not, in my judgment, the importance which is so commonly assigned to it; for the simple reason that the reports, even of eye-witnesses, would not suffice to justify belief in a large and essential part of their contents; on the contrary, these reports would discredit the witnesses. The Gadarene miracle, for example, is so extremely improbable, that the fact of its being reported by three, even independent, authorities could not justify belief in it unless we had the clearest evidence as to their capacity as observers and as interpreters of their observations. But it is evident that the three authorities are not independent; that they hav simply adopted a legend, of which there were two versions; and instead of their proving its truth, it suggests their superstitious credulity; so that, if "Matthew," "Mark," and "Luke" are really responsible for the gospels, it is not the better for the Gadarene story, but the worse for them.

A wonderful amount of controversial capital has been made out of my assertion in the note to which I hav referred, as an obiter dictum of no consequence to my argument, that, if Renan's work* were nonextant, the main results of biblical criticism as set forth in the works of Strauss, Baur, Reuss, and Volkmar, for example, would not be sensibly affected. I thought I had explained it satisfactorily already, but it seems that my explanation has only exhibited still more of my nativ perversity, so I ask for one more chance.

In the course of the historical development of any branch of science, what is universally observed is this: that the men who make epochs and are the real architects of the fabric of exact knowledge are those who introduce fruitful ideas or methods. As a rule, the man who does this pushes his idea or his method too far; or, if he does not, his school is sure to do so, and those who follow hav to reduce his work to its proper value, and assign it its place in the whole. Not unfrequently they, in their turn, overdo the critical process, and, in trying to eliminate errors, throw away truth.

Thus, as I said, Linnæus, Buffon, Cuvier, Lamarck, really "set forth the results" of a developing science, although they often heartily contradict one another. Notwithstanding this circumstance, modern classificatory method and nomenclature hav largely grown out of the results of the work of Linnæus; the modern conception of biology, as a science, and of its relation to climatology, geography, and geology, are as largely rooted in the results of the labors of Buffon; comparativ anatomy and paleontology owe a vast debt to Cuvier's results; while invertebrate zoology and the revival of the idea of evolution are intimately dependent on the results of the work of Lamarck. In other words, the main results of biology up to the early years of this century are to be found in, or spring out of, the works of these men.

So, if I mistake not, Strauss, if he did not originate the idea of taking the mythopœic faculty into account in the development of the gospel narrativs; and, though he may hav exaggerated the influence of that faculty, obliged scientific theology hereafter to take that element into serious consideration; so Baur, in giving prominence to the cardinal fact of the divergence of the Nazarene and Pauline tendencies in the primitiv church; so Reuss, in setting a marvelous example of the cool and dispassionate application of the principles of scientific criticism over the whole field of scripture; so Volkmar, in his clear and forcible statement of the Nazarene limitations of Jesus, contributed results of permanent value in scientific theology. I took these names as they occurred to me. Undoubtedly, I might hav advantageously added to them; perhaps I might hav made a better selection. But it really is absurd to try to make out that I did not know that these writers widely disagree; and I believe that no scientific theologian will deny that, in principle, what I hav said is perfectly correct. Ecclesiastical advocates, of course, cannot be expected to take this view of the matter. To them, these mere seekers after truth, in so far as their results are unfavorable to the creed the clerics hav to support, are more or less "Infidels," or favorers of "Infidelity;" and the only thing they care to see, or probably can see, is the fact that, in a great many matters, the truth seekers differ from one another, and therefore can easily be exhibited to the public, as if they did nothing else; as if anyone who referred to them, as having each and all contributed his share to the results of theological science, was merely showing his ignorance; and, as if a charge of inconsistency could be based on the fact that he himself often disagrees with what they say. I hav never lent a shadow of foundation to the assumption that I am a follower of either Strauss, or Baur, or Reuss, or Volkmar, or Renan; my debt to these eminent men—so far my superiors in theological knowledge—is, indeed, great; yet it is not for their opinions, but for those I hav been able to form for myself, by their help.

In "Agnosticism: a Rejoinder" (p. 484)* I hav referred to the difficulties under which those professors of the science of theology, whose tenure of their posts depends on the results of their investigations, must labor; and, in a note, I add:

Imagin that all our chairs of astronomy had been founded in the fourteenth century, and that their incumbents were bound to sign Ptolemaic articles. In that case, with every respect for the efforts of persons thus hampered to attain and expound the truth, I think men of common sense would go elsewhere to learn astronomy.

I did not write this paragraph without a knowledge that its sense would be open to the kind of perversion which it has suffered; but, if that was clear, the necessity for the statement was still clearer. It is my deliberate opinion: I reiterate it; and I say that, in my judgment, it is extremely inexpedient that any subject which calls itself a science should be intrusted to teachers who are debarred from freely following out scientific methods to their legitimate conclusions, whatever those conclusions may be. If I may borrow a phrase paraded at the church congress, I think it "ought to be unpleasant" for any man of science to find himself in the position of such a teacher.

Human nature is not altered by seating it in a professorial chair, even of theology. I hav very little doubt that if, in the year 1859, the tenure of my office had depended on my adherence to the doctrins of Cuvier, the objections to those set forth in the "Origin of Species" would hav had a halo of gravity about them that, being free to teach what I pleased, I failed to discover. And, in making that statement, it does not appear to me that I am confessing that I should hav been debarred by "selfish interests" from making candid inquiry, or that I should hav been biased by "sordid motives." I hope that even such a fragment of moral sense as may remain in an ecclesiastical "infidel" might hav got me through the difficulty; but it would be unworthy to deny or disguise the fact that a very serious difficulty must hav been created for me by the nature of my tenure. And let it be observed that the temptation, in my case, would hav been far slighter than in that of a professor of theology; whatever biological doctrin I had repudiated, nobody I cared for would hav thought the worse of me for so doing. No scientific journals would hav howled me down, as the religious newspapers howled down my too honest friend, the late bishop of Natal; nor would my colleagues in the Royal Society hav turned their backs upon me, as his episcopal colleagues boycotted him.

I say these facts are obvious, and that it is wholesome and needful that they should be stated. It is in the interests of theology, if it be a science, and it is in the interests of those teachers of theology who desire to be something better than counsel for creeds, that it should be taken to heart. The seeker after theological truth, and that only, will no more suppose that I hav insulted him than the prisoner who works in fetters will try to pick a quarrel with me, if I suggest that he would get on better if the fetters were knocked off; unless, indeed, as it is said does happen in the course of long captivities, that the victim at length ceases to feel the weight of his chains or even takes to hugging them, as if they were honorable ornaments.* THOMAS H. HUXLEY.

* To-day's Times contains a report of a remarkable speech by Prince Bismarck, in which he tells the Reichstag that he has long given up investing in foreign stock, lest so doing should mislead his judgment in his transactions with foreign states. Does this declaration prove that the chancellor accuses himself of being "sordid" and "selfish," or does it not rather show that, even in dealing with himself, he remains the man of realities?

Job.

I hav been reading that strange and by no means pleasing story of Job. It is a story that does not send the blood bounding through one's veins as bounds the roebuck through the wildwood at the call of its mate; or as the agil and predaceous rodent of the genus mus bounds through our kitchen and our halls at night in quest of provender, or bonds and bank notes, perchance lying round loose, the same making nice nest lining, when finely chewed and the bits judiciously distributed; nor does the story soothe one's nerves, conducing to peaceful slumber, as do Howells's stories; besides, the tale tells heavily against Jahveh, whose "horn" is by no means "exalted," in my eyes, by the part he took in the most unwarrantable affair brought about by him.

I won't pretend that I waded through all those lugubrious and tiresome arguments of the "comforters" of Job who came to him in his affliction, and sat upon the ground with him seven days and seven nights in utter silence, Job being the first of the quartet to break the spell of hushness, the others getting in their dissertations as the spirit moved them, one Elihu bobbing up unexpectedly and shooting off his mouth with some considerable severity at Job, who, whatever may be said of his patience, was in a boil-ing state of vexation and lamentation. I did not scrupulously follow the moanings of Job, neither did I scoop in all those preposterous and vain-glorious conundrums propounded by Jahveh, such as asking Job where he was when he (Jahveh) laid the corner-stone of the earth? If he (Job) could catch a leviathan (whale, probably) with a pin hook, and pull his tongue out with the line? If he could harness the unicorn? If he could shut up the sea with doors? etc. No, I did not religiously take in all these oralities, simply enough of them to catch the drift thereof, but the moving incidents by flood and field, so to speak, I very carefully perused, the same occupying but two chapters, the other forty being given over to individual mouthings.

The story of Job presents startling, shocking, and agonizing features, relieved somewhat by the insouciance and don't-careacussativness of one Satan, in his response to an impertinent query of Jahveh's, and that squatting seance, silent and solemn, for the space of seven days and seven nights, of Job and his "comforters." Think of four specimens of the genus homo, not dumb nor paralyzed, squatting on the ground in a bunch, and maintaining silence for the space of time above stated! Look at 'em, see 'em with your mind's eye, squatted there, winking and blinking at one another, yawning and squirming, but saying naught, like four prize idiots in a go as-you-please non-talking match. However, the story ends well for the hero, as all stories should, to be popular, Job recovering to his former state of health, recouping his loss in asses and camels and cows twice over, also getting another batch of sons and daughters, seven of one and three of the other, as before the cyclone that killed the first batch; in short, he was hunk in sons, daughters, and shekels, doubly hunk in stock on the hoof, and lived one hundred and forty years after being so terribly boil-ed! But how all this helped the sons and daughters needlessly slaughtered, the Holy Queer does not state.

The scene of this story is laid in Uz, a township located somewhere to the east-son-west-by-no'th of Jericho or Jezreal, in a back country having no railroad communications, but working the fast camel express for all it was worth, probably. The tale opens by stating that Job was as good as they made 'em, better, in fact, for it says he was full as a goose of natural and acquired goodness, with no room in his mental and moral make-up for the accommodation of guile in its mildest form—not precisely in that diction, but precisely in that direction. Job, it appears, was not only great in goodness but great in this world's goods—"the greatest of all the men in the east," the H. Q. says; but the greatness of goodness under which he labored did not protect him from the assaults of one Satan, Jahveh being particeps criminis, in fact, the putter-up of the job on Job!

And what a job that was for a loving, merciful father to put up on a loving son, eh? Not in the annals of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children is there any record of so cruel a father! All Job's stock of asses and camels and kine and sheep run off or struck by lightning; his stock of children killed by a ruthless cyclone, and his stock of servants by predatory Chaldeans, and he himself inundated and overwhelmed with boils, and all for what? Just to satisfy a third party that there was one man on earth who would stick to Jahveh through thick and thin, even though the heavens should fall! And this third party, who was he? One Satan, of whose antecedents nothing is said in the seventeen books of the H. Q preceding that of "Job," save that he once tempted David to take a census of Israel, which, when taken, caused Jerusalem and outlying territory to be fearfully shaken by a pestilence, Jahveh "waxing wroth" on account of Dave getting up the census, or rather because Dave had succumbed to the temptation of Satan; a trifling thing for Jahveh to "wax wroth" about, considering that he himself had "tempted Abraham" to slaughter his beloved son Ike!

Why Jahveh felt called upon to prove to Satan that Job, his "best man"—he tells Satan "there is none like him in the earth"—would go through fire and water, robbery and whirlwinds, boils and death—one can survive much death among cattle and relativs, you know—and yet hold fast to his faith in the goodness of his God, is what no fellow can find out, unless he charges it to vanity; and to vanity I ascribe it. What effect this drastic visitation of Job had on the cause of Zion, the H. Q. does not state; but one can't help thinking that it must hav been a damaging one. "If Jahveh serves up his best man in this way, we'll stick to Baal," was, no doubt, the reasoning of the hour, and sensible reasoning it was.

The one refreshing incident of this story was connected with the meeting of Jahveh and Satan, which is given twice, on account of its revivifying nature, I suppose. It seems that, when the "sons of God" came to pay their respects to Jahveh, "Satan came also," peaceably and decorously, no doubt. Seeing him among his "sons," Jahveh, brusquely and impertinently, it seems to me, blurted out, "Whence comest thou?" With his beaver cocked, one eye a-squint, and his thumbs in the arm-holes of his vest, Satan, nonchalantly, and with the utmost sang froid, replied, "From going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it." Now, among humans, such a response would be considered as bordering on contempt, slightly tinctured with sarcasticity, so to speak, and one would be apt to bridle on getting it right in his teeth, while a god would be supposed to "wax wroth" on the spur of the moment, and make his presence felt. Not so with Jahveh, for a wonder, who immediately and mildly asked if Satan knew what a solid Muldoon of faith Job was in the ranks of Zion—which led to that fearful job on Job!

But that response of Satan's—wasn't it refreshingly cool, with its nonchalance, its abandon, its sang froid, its insouciance, its esprit, and all those condiments à la Française? Why, I would hav given four dollars to hav seen him as he posed for the reply, and four more to hav heard the delivery. It would hav been a great treat!

We hav heard much concerning Job's patience and fortitude under his difficulties, and, according to the H. Q., he stood the loss of his children, servants, asses, and things wonderfully well, but the boils were too many and too much for him. To be sure, he didn't then "curse God and die," as Mrs. Job recommended, but he did whine like a dog with a sore head, squeal like a sick shoat, and not to be wondered at. A friend, with one boil only, once said to me that, if by kissing his mother-in-law he could rid himself of the boil, he would thusly stoop to conquer, even before witnesses!

A good many, who do not burn the midnight oil, investigating the mysteries of the Holy Queer, are under the impression that Job suffered in silence the boil infliction, but he didn't, after that singularly silent and solemn squat of seven days and nights, shooting off his mouth then copiously, his first blast being to curse the day he was born; he cried out for it to be painted black, and the night to be chopped into slivers. He wished he was dead forty times an hour, and with forty-horse-power fervency. He asked all sorts of conundrums and worked off all sorts of apothegms, such as, "Doth the wild ass bray when he hath grass?" "Is there any taste in the white of an egg?" "Am I a sea or a whale?" "Hast thou not poured me out as milk and curdled me as cheese?"—this of Jahveh, directly. "If a man die, shall he liv again?"—he knew nothing of a "hereafter." "Man that is born of woman is of few days and full of trouble"—that's so; but Adam wasn't thusly born, yet he had trouble, through a good many days. "My bowels boil"—whew! internal boils, eh? "I am a brother to dragons, and a chum of owls"—a little off his nut, I think, with pain and anguish. "I was eyes to the blind, feet to the lame, and father to the poor"—good for you, Job; but it was not good form to speak of it yourself.

And so poor Job let himself out; now mournfully, now savagely; now whiningly, now boastfully; now regretfully, now resentfully; now gloomily, now hopefully, and so forth and so on, one of the sharpest things he worked off under the inspiration of those boils being this: "Oh, that mine adversary had written a book," showing that somewhat of the old Adam lingered yet in his make-up, for no human wants his enemy to write a book, unless it is to damn himself. I am glad that poor suffering Job thus expressed himself, glad that he could and did fret, fume, whine, growl, and curse, thus proving that he had somewhat of human nature "into" him, and so was not too awfully angelic for this mundane sphere. Who wants more of the story of Job than he gets here, let him tackle the Holy Queer. Selah!

SI SLOKUM.

No Fight, No Prayer.

A group of naval officers were indulging the other day in reminiscences of the war, when one of them told the following yarn:

"Early on the morning of Dec. 24, 1864," he said, "Admiral Porter signaled to the fleet before Fort Fisher, 'Get under way and follow me.' The ship to which I belonged was assigned in the program to a position between two ironclads close under the fort. We anticipated hot and terrible work. The flagship led the way and was approaching within range, when Lieutenant Commander B—— of my ship ordered all hands called to muster. The brawny tars gathered aft on the quarterdeck, with the officers in their usual places, and our commander began to read from the prayer-book the 'Prayer Before Battle.' It was a solemn moment. None knew who or how many among us might suddenly be ushered into the presence of the God of battles. Our commander read as though he felt it; the whole ship's company were awed and hushed, and the throbbing of the engins and wash of water along the side seemed preternaturally loud. When about half through a signal was reported from the flagship:

"'Come to anchor in your positions.'

"When it was read to our commander a sudden revulsion of feeling came over him. Throwing down the prayer-book upon the hatch, he exclaimed:

"'Well, I'll be —— if I'm going to pray if we ain't going to fight! Pipe down!'"

Thirteenth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union.

OFFICIAL CALL.

The next Annual Congress of the American Secular Union will be held in Philadelphia on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, October 25, 26, and 27, 1889. It is deemed expedient to hold this meeting where our society was organized in 1876, and where the so-called "National Reform Association" has its headquarters and has recently held an important convention, and for many historic and other reasons.

The general object of our Association not being well understood, it is therefore often misrepresented. It is deemed proper to here make a brief statement of its leading principles. While our federal and state constitutions are formed on the assumption of the total separation of church and state, yet both the general and state governments maintain numerous practical connections of the state with the church. Moreover, a large, wealthy, and influential organization exists, having for its avowed object the amendment of our federal and state constitutions, so as to recognize and enforce by law certain forms of religious belief and observances, and certain acts of legislation hav actually been proposed and discussed in the United States Senate for virtually establishing a form of sectarian religion, especially in our public schools.

Against these innovations and perversions we are organized to protest, and to this end we advocate the equitable taxation of church property; the total discontinuance of religious instruction and worship in the public schools; the repeal of all laws enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath; the cessation of all appropriations of the public funds for religious institutions; the abolition of state-paid chaplaincies; the substitution of simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury for the judicial oath; the non-appointment of religious fasts, festivals, and holidays by public authority; the practical establishment of simple morality and intelligence as the basis of purely Secular government and the adequate guarantee of public order, prosperity, and righteousness; and whatever other measures or principles may be necessary to the total separation of church and state.

To this Congress we cordially invite all true patriots without regard to their individual religious belief or disbelief, who are willing to work for the maintenance of the Secular principle in our civil government, and to oppose the machinations of sacerdotalists, whether Catholic or Protestant, in their schemes to gain ecclesiastical supremacy, and destroy the mental and moral liberty of the free citizens of this most successful of all Secular civil governments in ancient or modern times.

All Charter and Life Members, all Vice-presidents, all Chairmen of State Executiv Committees, and all duly accredited delegates from Local Secular Societies are entitled to seats and votes in this Congress. Each Local Society is entitled to send its President, Secretary, and three other delegates. Annual Members by payment of one dollar are entitled to seats.

Particulars as to the place of meeting, speakers, and their subjects, etc., will be announced hereafter.

The Secular Position.

The subject of Secular versus sectarian education has recently received an impetus in the minds of the general public, especially by the discussion between E. D. Mead, of Boston, and the representativ of Cardinal Gibbons before the National Educational Association at Nashville last month. The strenuous efforts which are being put forth by Christians of all denominations, particularly by the Roman church, to bring the public school system under ecclesiastical domination, hav at length called forth from even easy-going Liberals several protests. The newspapers—those which hav not been entirely subsidized in the interests of the church—hav shaken off their chronic lethargy and mustered up sufficient courage to oppose (very mildly and courteously, it is true), the position taken by the Christian champions.

The great trouble is that these Liberal and journalistic critics are disposed to make entirely too many concessions to the religionists. Their attitude is almost apologetic, and altogether too conciliatory and deferential to offer anything like a formidable resistance to threatened ecclesiastical usurpation. It is so evident that he who runs may read that the ultimate aim of the church is nothing more nor less than a complete union with the state—aye, more—for it would not only be united with the state but would dominate it. Church and state must be one, and the church must be the one. There is the whole truth in a nutshell. Now, the church recognizes the fact that the mind of the child is plastic, and that impressions produced upon it are likely to be of lifelong duration. Knowing this, it reasons logically and correctly, that it is much easier to train a statesman than to correct one. The school-children of to day will be the legislators and the lawgivers fifteen or twenty years from now. Imbue, then, the impressionable minds of these children with the idea that the Christian church is the source of all wisdom, the foundation of all truth, and the ultimate authority for the conduct of human affairs, and it is but a matter of a few years, more or less, ere we shall see the cross above the flag, and secularism in the state superseded by sacerdotalism.

Says Cardinal Gibbons: "Our youth must put in practice, every day, the commands of God, as well as the rules of arithmetic." This statement, so dogmatically put forth, is manifestly absurd, and for this reason. The rules of arithmetic, or of any branch of mathematical science, are of universal application and compel equally the assent of the people of all ages, races, and nationalities.

Mathematics is an exact science; in it nothing is assumed or taken for granted—every statement is incontrovertibly verified. Now theology cannot be classed as a science at all, since it is merely a huge conglomeration of unsupported hypotheses. Even the existence of a God is a speculativ hypothesis alone, and there is no more evidence in favor of the Christian's God than there is of any other. Now, if this God's very existence is matter which may be disputed, what folly to talk of his "commands," as being equally binding upon our youth as the rules of arithmetic. But, assuming the theory of the existence of a God, or even the Christian God, to be as self-evident as the statement that "the whole is greater than its part," for instance, there is as great a diversity of opinion even among those who accept this dogma as to the nature of these commands as there is in philosophical circles in regard to the existence or manner of existence of him who is supposed to issue them.

Every petty sect claims the right to explain and interpret these "commands" to its own satisfaction. The Roman Catholic church, of course, ignores these claims, declaring that it alone is authorized and sanctioned to interpret the divine will. Protestants, however, of all denominations, no matter how widely they may differ in other respects, are nevertheless agreed that the pretensions of the mother church are preposterous and cannot be entertained. Now, when the Christians themselvs cannot agree as to these alleged "commands of God," why should they be imposed upon those who hav no use for either "God" or his "commands?" Why should the Jew, the Mohammedan, the pagan perchance, the Atheist, the Deist, the Spiritualist, etc., be taxed that their children may be taught a lot of what to their parents is simply rubbish? Such a requirement is an outrage on justice. If the Roman Catholic, the Presbyterian, Methodist, Baptist, etc., want their children trained to follow in their footsteps, let them see to it—let them inculcate that in their homes. For, if religion is to be introduced into our schools, we certainly shall then need a theological training for our teachers. Then we shall soon learn that no matter how high intellectually and scholarly a teacher may be—how well fitted for the important work of educating the young—the standard of acceptance used will depend on their pretended acceptance of these impossible "commands of God." Imagin a peculiarly zealous disciple of Christianity an examiner where there are two candidates, one of whom should come fully up to the required standard in all departments of secular knowledge and the best methods of imparting it, but whose theology might be adjudged somewhat "shaky," and the other of whom should reverse this state of things, and evince more familiarity with the doctrins of Christianity and zeal in their propagation than he should with the rules of arithmetic, who would be likely to receive the appointment? So far as possible the church appoints and controls now the larger portion of its devotees to the training of the young in our public schools, but we now hav a right to protest where they go beyond the requirements of the state. Make religious training a part of the curriculum of our schools, and that would destroy not only their present efficiency but they would become a monstrous and more expensiv burden.

The only safe course for the state to tread is to steadily resist these insidious advances on the part of the church. The former cannot afford to coquet with the latter. An impassable gulf, such as Christ is said to hav set between Dives from Lazarus, must be "fixed" between them, and, though the church may stretch forth imploring arms, the attitude of the state must be firm and decided in rejecting the overtures of the former. The common schools must be thoroughly secularized; even the text-books should be rigidly inspected, as a good deal of dogma is frequently allowed to crop out in them. Not only should the Bible be carefully excluded from the school-room, but all references to God as a personality, or to the supposed superiority of Christianity as a religious system, should be discouraged. Eternal vigilanceis the price of religious as well as of other kinds of liberty, and in no direction is it more imperativly demanded than in the preservation of our system of secular education.

Every attempt to introduce religious instruction into the public schools must be frowned down, and fought down. The public schools are under state control, and must ever be kept so. The church must not be permitted to interfere, must not be allowed to advise or admonish the commonwealth in this regard. The state represents the embodied majesty of the whole people, and inasmuch as the whole is greater than its part, it is the duty of the state to act as a check upon the church, and vice versa. It is for the state to stretch forth the arm of civil authority and say to the proud waves of ecclesiastical encroachment: "Thus far shall ye come, and no farther."

The American people demand that the state shall sacredly guard the public schools against the unlawful intrusion of priest or prelate. The people hav intrusted the schools in the care of the state; let the latter see that no influence be brought to bear upon it to make it unfaithful to that trust; let it render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, unto God the things that are God's.

In conclusion it may be said that it by no means follows from this that moral training shall be excluded from our schools. Secularism not only does not demand this, but the American Secular Union, through its executiv head, is preparing for a higher, nobler, and better code to be taught to the young, merely insisting upon the exclusion therefrom of exploded creeds and debasing dogmas.

The religious zealots' ethics are ofttimes of a very questionable character, and would utterly fail to stand the test of a rigid scrutiny.

Secularists, as represented by the American Secular Union, are deeply interested in inculcating a just system of ethics—one that will stand the test of enlightened common sense and the laws of nature—devoid of cant and custom—a system of ethics and high moral aims fit for presentation to the minds of our youth.

Those who desire can aid and enrol themselvs in this great work which will giv the American Secular Union renown for not only settling the great Girard College question by this code, but for presenting to the American people a solution of the conflict between Romish rule and the American idea of Secular schools. All who can forward $100 $50, or $25 to this work should do so immediately.

The time for the Congress is approaching; now rally to the work. Let your acts show how much you are interested.

E. A. STEVENS,
Secretary American Secular Union.

A Platform.

Colonel Miner, editor of the Western American, lays down a platform upon which most Secularists would be willing to stand, and it shows that the work of the American Union has been quite effectiv when those interrogations are being made and articles like the following are being printed outside the regular Freethought press. We rejoice to see that the gallant colonel is sound on the Secular position. This is the platform:

We are constantly receiving letters from readers in all parts of the Union, who ask: "What can we expect from the Democratic or Republican parties? They both are fighting for the 'Irish vote,' both busy trading and promising any and all offices for that vote." They suggest that an American party be formed, and ask: "What can we do to resist the aggressions of the Roman corporation? How can civil and religious liberty be saved to us and our posterity?"

These are serious questions and are daily being brought to the attention of all loyal Americans. The arrogant and unscrupulous acts of this Roman church, so called, are attracting the attention of men who regard our republican forms with patriotic love and veneration. They are convinced by the acts of an arrogant hierarchy that our institutions are in danger; that there is a conspiracy on foot prompted by a foreign corporation, who are desperate, alarmed by the enmity of all Europe that has for a thousand years been the victim of its infamous practices, and who is showing her contempt and detestation for the "Mother of Harlots" by serving notices of ejectment upon her.

The United States has too long been the dumping-ground of Europe. Her paupers, insane, and criminals we can manage to provide for; but when it is proposed to dump into this land that infamy, hoary with the blood of millions murdered for daring to think, reeking with torture, robbery, tyranny, in fact every crime known to the decalog, it is time for this people to call a halt, to look about them and see if we can afford to permit these Jesuit schemes to be perfected. When bigotry rules, then the people suffer, and it is evident to any observer that the plans hav been well laid and are being carried out to take from this people every right that makes this republican government the best on this planet.

Enough has been written in this paper to show that the pagan papal Romish machine is bending all its energies to deceive this people, to hoodwink them with lying, specious pretenses, until she can count votes enough to put a Jesuit in the White House and rule this American Union.

To prevent this horrible crime against humanity, we suggest to our readers the following platform, our legislativ policy, which may prevent the accomplishment of the pagan Roman conspiracy.

The national and state constitutions must be amended in the interest of self-preservation, in order that the bridges left over the trench dug by the founders of this nation between church and state may be cut away, utterly destroyed —that the separation may be final and complete. There is danger to this republic as long as we neglect this duty; it is imperativ that this question be seriously considered by the citizens of the Union. If we delay we shall in a few years be unable to preserve the heritage of our fathers without bloody conflict. Let us be wise while we hav the power; let us provide for the preservation of civil and religious liberty.

THE PLATFORM.

1. To amend the national and state constitutions, forbidding the donation or appropriation of public funds, lands, or tenements to any body or institution that is under sectarian control.

2. To amend the national and state constitutions forbidding any special legislation of any kind for the benefit of any religious society.

3. To provide that all who vote shall read and write in the English language.

4. That each state amend its constitution to provide that the state is above any church.

5. That all laws shall be general, no "special legislation" be permitted, and laws enacted shall be for the whole people of the state.

6. That all religious or church property shall be held and recorded in the name of trustees, and not by single prelates who owe fealty to a foreign head.

7. That the immigration laws be changed to insure a better class of immigrants, and compel all to pay a tax for the privilege of landing upon our shores.

8. That the states shall maintain an unsectarian free school system, and compel all children of school age to attend, where they can learn to think rather than repeat, also learn the duties of a citizen of this republic, and loyalty to our flag and constitution.

9. That any interference, by any church in civil affairs, be promptly resisted and punished.

10. That all houses of every kind, religious or secular, shall be subject to visitation and inspection by state officers.

11. To tax all property, secular and religious, the Mormon temple, the Chinese Joss house, the Roman cathedral, and Protestant chapel, and thus giv Christians an opportunity to obey Christ, who ordered them to "render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's."

12. That the oath taken by naturalized voters shall require them to abjure all allegiance to the pope of Rome, if they belong to that corporation.

The above platform includes the reforms that are thought to be necessary to insure a complete separation of state and church that we may help on the time when we shall see the much desired grand ideal of a free state, untrammeled by priestcraft, and a free church untouched by the civil power.

When this government was founded a new departure was taken. The fathers determined that, unlike any other government then existing on this planet, this would furnish a system in which the state should be separate from the church. It was done, and a century of remarkable development, wonderful prosperity, and unequaled progress attests their wisdom, has surpassed their expectations, and we of this generation are lacking in gratitude if not grateful to them for deliverance from the greatest thrall that has affected mankind in all the centuries since creation began.

When the fathers said that there should be no union of state and church, they voiced the sentiments of untold millions of victims who for sixteen centuries had suffered from the crimes of prince and priest. They said the accumulated cries, protests and groans of outraged humanity should be heard, and the kind, loving precepts of Christ should find a place in the fundamental law of this nation. They decreed that in civil affairs the state should be above the church, that all deference should be paid to the religious views of the people, all should hav the right to believe as their conscience dictates, with no help or hindrance from the state; they knew that religion joined to the state soon becomes superstitious mummery, that state united to a church always becomes despotic, they said religion was too sacred to be soiled by the hands of the state, that it should be left in the hearts and conscience of the people, where it rightfully belongs; they promised to religion equality and fair dealing before the law, but no privileges, and decreed that no law should be passed to establish any form of religion; in short, they formed a secular government, the first on earth.

Our success under this system has been such as to leave no desire on the part of our citizens for a change. The good that has resulted has confirmed us in the resolve, not only to continue the system, but to perfect it by eradicating evils that hav grown by use to such proportions as to defeat partially the working of the system.

In Europe, we find that all governments are busy maintaining some sort of state religion; note the evils that result. We can rejoice that here no man is compelled "to carry a priest on his back," or contribute to support, directly or indirectly, a creed he does not believe; each citizen selects the creed that pleases him, or that meets his views, and if his views and practices do not interfere with the rights of others, or conflict with law, he is free to believe as he pleases.

This is the theory of this American government. How is it in practice? Investigations show that we hav, in many instances, departed from the spirit and intentions of the fundamental law of this nation. We hav permitted churchmen to encroach upon the domain of the state, and suffered things to be done which impair the dignity of the state and degrade religion.

Under a mistaken idea, that had come to them after twelve centuries of teaching by prince and priest, they exempted church property from taxation, they permitted money and property to be appropriated for institutions under sectarian control; laws to be enacted favoring a particular creed or religion; they subsidized schools that taught a creed. They hav permitted an alien priest to appoint agents in all the states and territories who hold many millions of real estate in trust for this alien Italian, who is at the head of a great trust or corporation; they hav permitted the agents of these foreign priests to set up schools in all the states which teach disloyalty to our flag, and prevent five hundred thousand of the youth of this land from learning their duty to this republic; they permit a foreign church to combine the votes of its laity, then compel them to cast it solid for the party or person that will do most to carry out the designs of this foreign priest; to destroy civil and religious liberty, they hav permitted this foreign priest to invest his agents living here with titles of nobility. All these things hav been done in violation of the spirit of the principles of the constitution of a secular government. The American state is based upon the rights of men as citizens. As such it controls the law and is not controled by it. It creates an army but is not ruled by it. It protects churches and is not governed by their creeds. The state is supreme, and the equal rights of its citizens are the only rights that are permanent. It concerns itself only with men as citizens. It was clearly the intention of the fathers to leave religion free from any aid or interference by the state. Washington, 1789, writing to the Presbyterians of Massachusetts, said: "Religion was left out of the account, because it properly belonged to the care of the churches rather than to the state." Madison said: "Religion is not within the purview of human government." Franklin wrote: "When a religion is good I believe it will support itself; when it cannot do so and God does not take care of it, I apprehend it is a bad religion."

The supreme courts, national and state, hav frequently decided that this government is secular, hence it must be admitted that if we do not want "a priest on our backs," we must insist that all attempts to impair or change the secular features of this government must be met and resisted. The platform announced in this paper will be taken in hand and fully discussed, with such facts and statistics as will satisfy all who are loyal to this American republic that the reforms suggested are of vital importance if we desire to hand down to posterity the trust given to us by our fathers. We invite the careful consideration of all who desire the perpetuation of this American Union to the facts and measures we shall lay before them for the purpose of closing the door against the advent of a power whose history is one long record of cruel tyranny and disregard of the rights of humanity.

The Oregon Secular Union Convention.

In pursuance of the authority invested in us by the Oregon State Secular Union, we hereby call the first annual convention of said Union, to meet in Portland, Ore., at Masonic Hall, on Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, the 12th, 13th, and 14th days of October, 1889.

The object is to secure the total separation of church and state.

The advocates of this measure in Washington are invited to join their Oregon friends in this convention. Done at Portland, Ore., this July 31, 1889.

The Church and Science.

The pope has decided to permit the erection of an astronomical observatory in the Vatican, the site selected being the tower over the rooms occupied by the master of the Sacred College, it being the most elevated portion of the building. The cost is estimated at one million florins.—Daily paper.

The world "do move," and in its "moving," various creeds and schools of fanatics are forced to bow the knee of humble acquiescence.

The idea of Christianity proposing to build an "astronomical observatory" to perpetuate a knowledge of astronomy, and in the same locality where only a few years ago it burnt people at the stake for simply asserting the truth of astronomical knowledge, does seem, to an unprejudiced mind, the quintessence of crow-eating.

When an Italian astronomer voiced the truth in opposition to a mass of biblical balderdash, known as the "science and astronomy" of Joshua and Moses, he was roasted at the stake by the good Christian fathers of the church; and now, this same church, by its present managers, proposes to erect "an astronomical observatory," thus giving the lie flat to all its former teachings as also to all its former managers.

Query: If the former fathers of the church hav taught and maintained—even by burnings and butcherings—ridiculous, absurd, and most erroneous doctrins, what proof hav we to show that the present fathers of this same church are not preaching and practicing doctrins as erroneous and as ridiculous as were the doctrins of their predecessors, and for the proof of which we hav simply to wait a few years?

Is not all this a very sad, a very humiliating, a very ridiculous commentary upon this church's Bible creed and its Bible God? An omniscient God; a God the creator of all things; a God the founder of his own religious worship—such a one who knows not his own mind nor matters he himself created; in other words, a God who makes a spade, but owing to its complex nature does not recognize it, and must depend upon finite man for his knowledge—such a God is surely absurdness boiled down.

What is religion, then, please, but the pure and simple "creature" of finite man in all the past ages of the world? And how simple is the proof thereof; for it we hav only to scan the pages of history. For of a truth that which was orthodoxy yesterday is to-day rank superstition; and that which to-day is the purest of orthodoxy will just as surely be on to-morrow the very rankest of superstition; and this will continue to be so on the end of time itself.

Ignorance, superstition, and bloody fanaticism in the past ever hav been the pliant tools of the church; on the contrary and in opposition thereto, science and popular education hav been the true champions and the redeemers of priest-ridden mankind. Whenever and wherever these two antagonistic principles met a bitter, vindictiv, and an unrelenting war was at once inaugurated by the church to maintain its usual supremacy over the minds and fanatical passions of the masses. And how was this war waged? By moral suasion and by peaceful means? Never. But with the rack, the fagot, and the stake and all the devil-conceived machinery of its ghoulish inquisitions it always exerted its powerful and baleful influence in upholding and in the extension of fanatical ignorance; ever strenuously opposing as emanating from the devil each and every step forward in art, science, and learning. Nevertheless, always true to its colors and churchly instincts (for proof, see proposition above to construct an "astronomical observatory"), that very moment the church observes the inevitable triumph of a scientific fact or common-sense principle it immediately scrambles into the pulpit, while yet reeking in the blood of its roasted victims, and at once hypocritically proclaims to an astonished world: "Oh, yes, these truths are self-evident. The church teaches them; in fact, has always taught them, for are they not in accord with the Bible and with common sense?" Such an exhibition of brazen-faced cheek and contemptible hypocrisy, to say the least, is indeed "shamelessness added to shame."

What occult cause has worked so great and so beneficent a revolution as now permits poor priest-ridden man to speak, and even to think, freely his own thoughts? Was it the church and its influences? Hardly so, judging from its own established record for the past. If not the church, then what was it? It is simply and solely the invisible and silent march of intelligence, supported by science—this and nothing more.

Can any sane man or woman deny that even at this day that same church (dare it do so) would burn and butcher as it once did in all its former devilishness? Most assuredly it would; and it is only restrained from doing so through fear of utter annihilation.

Notwithstanding the church now acquiesces in and hypocritically approves of a given amount of intelligence for the masses, yet it quietly and secretly lies in wait, like a loathsome reptil, watching with hideous mien and hellish hate, ever praying for the time and opportunity to again come that it may bury its poisonous and death-dealing fangs into the quivering flesh of universal humanity, and by so doing stamp out at once and forever all public school systems in whatsoever part of the world they may be, thereby destroying at one fell swoop every semblance of independent intelligence.

How great and inextinguishable must be the debt now due from the past and present church-bedeviled people to those noble and heroic souls who faced the diabolical hate of that church, by manfully proclaiming the truth and the right of man to use nature's best gift, without the surveillance of a pack of self-constituted intermeddlers, who cheekily assume to control his conscience!

Now let us take a practical view of this church attitude, and in order to do this I will ask a simple question: Why does the church in these latter days reluctantly, though only openly, acquiesce in, while secretly rejecting and trying to nullify, any one given scientific fact? Why does she do this? Simply because a majority of revenue-producing mankind are of the intelligent class, and the church knows full well that, however it desires to do so, should it still cling to its biblical science, it would hav so few followers that its revenues (the only important part of the farcical institution) would silently dwindle away to nothing; it being a self-evident and indisputable proposition (to be proved needing only to be tried) that without its continuous inflowing stream of golden revenues, the present Christian organization would shortly cease to exist. To prove this latter proposition, the dupes hav only to discontinue their contributions to at once realize the simple fact that modern Christianity is simply and solely for "revenue only," and that without such revenues, its life—yea, even its remembrance amongst men—would be a matter of short duration. Try the proposed experiment; form a "universal non-contributing trust," and see how quickly my predictions are fully verified.

The following is a list of his appointments: Des Moines, Ia., August 16th; Prairie City, 17th; Grinnell, 18th; Galt, 19th; De Witt, 20th; West Union, 21st; Elgin, 22d, 23d; Patch Grove, Wis., 24th, 25th; Utica, Minn., 26th; St. Charles, 27th, 28th; Black River Falls, Wis., 29th, 30th; Princeton, Minn., 31st, September 1st; Elk River, 2d; Waterville, 3d; Dexter, 4th, 5th, 6th; Willmar, 7th, 8th; Ortonville, 9th; Fargo, N. Dak., 10th; Jamestown, 11th, 12th, 13th; Henry, S. Dak., 14th.

W. F. JAMIESON delivered, under the management of John Trueblood, his second course of lectures in Monte Vista., Col. Says the Journal: "Mr. Jamieson gave three lectures last week, which were attentivly listened to by large and appreciativ audiences." This time he compelled the editor of the Graphic, an "alleged Christian," as one of his brother editors calls him, to confess that Infidelity is a real benefit, after all, "by aiding to winnow the chaff from the wheat." Mr. Jamieson is receiving calls to lecture in Nebraska, Iowa, Kansas, and Missouri. Address at Coryell, Col.

Reason and Reform.

It is fabled that nineteen hundred years ago, at the birth of the son of a carpenter in Judea, angels appeared to shepherds, watching their flocks by night, and sang, "Peace on earth, good will to men." This child was to be the messiah who would usher in the epoch of universal harmony. Men believed this fable, and calling themselvs Christians professed to hav experienced a miraculous change, styled regeneration, or being born again, which made love the ruling principle in their natures. Under this influence peace and good will were to prevail, and be exercised toward all men. For nineteen centuries this theory has held sway in spheres of increasing magnitude; but with what result?

Individuals hav deemed this doctrin so important for the welfare of mankind at large that good will to man has justified hatred, cruelty, and murder toward men who denied the truth of the fable. The nations that adopted the Christian beliefs hav been foremost in extending their possessions by conquest, and the gospel of peace and good will has been proclaimed by sword and flame. In all lands, in spite of this profession of love, a system has prevailed by which the only methods of obtaining a livelihood were to sell one's labor to another, to induce others to work for less pay than the value of their product, or to make people pay more for goods than they cost. These three methods are direct violations of the law of love, which teaches: "Do unto others as you would hav others do unto you."

Men and nations in practice are committed to the upholding of force and fraud as the ruling principles of politics and economics, while all the time they profess to be governed by the theory of the angel's song, peace and good will. Millions of men are in arms awaiting the signal to destroy each other, each calling on God and the carpenter's son to "speed the right." Countless treasures are expended in means for devastation, and all in the name of religion and civilization. Men who most loudly proclaim themselvs to be followers of Jesus are banded together to secure monopolies of land, wood, coal, minerals, natural products, in fact, all things necessary for the life and comfort of mankind, and by inducing men to labor for them for less than half of the value they create and forcing others to pay twice the labor cost of the articles they require for food, clothing, and shelter they heap up riches and liv in luxury while multitudes are struggling with poverty and privation.

Nineteen centuries of belief in the fable of Jesus and his love hav failed to bring peace and good will to men. It has been reserved for those who reject this so-called revelation to point out the means by which peace and good will may be secured, and to show that it is not by a miraculous regeneration of human nature but by the application of reason to the spheres of politics and economics that society will be reformed.

It is highly significant that so many of the great promoters of political and social reform hav been rejecters of revelation. Rousseau, Voltaire, Paine, Franklin, Washington, Jefferson, Lincoln, Garibaldi, Mazzini, Owen, Prudhomme, Lassalle, Marx, Mill, and now Morris, Hyndman, Pearson, and all the leaders in modern labor reform, hav looked toward the regeneration of society, not by belief in miracle but by study of natural laws, not by faith but by reason.

Instead of belief that society is divinely ordered and that submission to rulers "ordained of God" is the duty of all, these Freethinkers claim that expediency—the greatest good of the greatest number—is the criterion of political rights, and that to determin these an equal chance for the exercise of voice and will must be given to every member of society. Human democracy as against divine despotism is the panacea for political ills. And as to the remedy for social ills, these rejecters of revelation deny that servants should submit themselvs to masters, or that men shall abide in the calling wherein they are called, be content with such things as they hav, and be resigned to the circumstances in which providence has placed them. Their mission is to fan the holy flame of discontent, from which springs all improvement; to teach men that no ills are ordained of God, but are the results of human ignorance and lack of control over natural forces. It is labor not prayer, knowledge not faith, that will giv the mastery over evil. And it is these unbelievers that hav pointed out that the prevailing system of trade, the competition for individual gain, is directly opposed to that principle of Reciprocity embodied in the Golden Rule, which for twenty-five centuries all the world's great moral teachers hav declared to be the fundamental ethical law. It is useless to preach a doctrin when a man's very existence depends upon a violation of that doctrin. It is vain to exhort to the practice of Reciprocity when the means of livelihood are only to be secured by appropriating the produce of the labor of others, by outwitting, overreaching, and striving against one's neighbor. The rationalistic students of society hav shown that in order to permit the exercise of the Golden Rule it is necessary that men should earn their living by associated work for the common benefit instead of by a competitiv grab, each man for himself. In this way only can men both liv, and love one another. The animals that strive against each other for the possession of the prey must ever be enemies, but those that labor collectivly for the general sustenance, each receiving all it needs from the common stock, hav no insuperable obstacle toward the mutual exercise of peace and good will. While men war against each other as employer and employee, capitalist and laborer, exploiter and exploited, there can be no peace; but when they see that if society at large owns all the capital, means of production, and methods of distribution, and employs each member to work for the common benefit, receiving in return the means for a comfortable subsistence, then will be removed the essential antagonism between men, and it will become possible and necessary to exercise good will.

This will become the crowning glory of Freethought, that it formulated an economic system under which love first became the ruling ethical principle and practice of society. By this introduction of a system that "makes for righteousness," Rationalism will make the twentieth century more potent for human good than Christianity has done with nineteen centuries. Those who rail at Freethought as destructiv only, not constructiv, as a mere negation, inferior to the old orthodoxy, should consider its influence in formulating schemes of political and social reform, and in creating the champions and pioneers of freedom.

Sunday Laws.

From the Fargo, N. D., Sunday Argus.

To the Argus: The constitutional convention is in session. Those who compose this body are assembled to frame a constitution that will recognize no man as an individual, nor no body of men as a distinct body, be it secular, ecclesiastical, educational, or otherwise. "All men hav equal rights," is an axiom of our nation, but every state violates this axiom in more ways than one. It will here suffice to state but a single violation of this aphorism, viz.: Sunday legislation, or laws which prohibit acts on that day that are lawful on all other days.

It cannot be found in all the teachings of Christ, or any of his apostles, that one day should be observed more than another.

Jesus himself was a Sabbath-breaker, and John so admits: "Therefore the Jews sought the more to kill him, because he not only had broken the Sabbath, but said also that God was his father" (John v, 18).

When Jesus was rebuked for working on the Sabbath, he said: "My father worketh hitherto, and I work" (John v, 17).

At another time when rebuked for plucking ears of corn he retorted by saying, among other things: "The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath; therefore the Son of man is Lord also of the Sabbath" (Mark ii, 27–28).

There are other instances, but space will not permit further quotation.

Jesus never enjoined an observance of Sabbath, Sunday, or any other day.

Nothing is said concerning the observance of any day in the Sermon on the Mount. To the young man who came to inquire what was necessary to be done to be saved, he said: "Thou knowest the commandments. Do not kill, Do not steal, Do not bear false witness, Defraud not, Honor thy father and mother" (Mark x, 19). The fourth commandment is not given; merely the moral laws of the Decalog, which are but natural and just.

Next to Christ, Paul stands as authority on theological subjects. What does he say about the observance of the Sabbath or any other day?

> One man esteemeth one day above another; another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind (Rom. xiv, 5).

For their superstitious observance of days he upbraids the Galatians:

> Ye observe days, and months, and times, and years. I am afraid of you, lest I hav bestowed upon you labor in vain (Gal. iv, 10, 11).

To the Colossians he writes:

> Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of a holy day, or of the new moon, or of the Sabbath days (Col. xi, 16).

The question now arises, Whence the origin and observance of Sunday? Much can be written in full explanation of its origin.

It is well known that each day of the week was consecrated to some god by the so-called heathen Greeks and Romans, and in fact by all ancient nations. These gods represented the principal celestial bodies—Sunday to the Sun, Monday to the Moon, Tuesday to Mars, Wednesday to Mercury, Thursday to Jupiter, Friday to Venus, and Saturday to Saturn. The feast to the Sun was the most observed. The ecclesiastics, knowing that some day must be set apart so that the people would hav nothing to do but attend church, selected the most popular of the pagan holidays, viz., Sunday, and influenced Constantine "the Great" to issue this edict in the year 321, A D.:

> Let all judges, and all people of the towns, rest, and all the various trades lie suspended, on the venerable day of the Sun. Those who liv in the country, however, may freely, and without fault, attend the cultivation of the fields, lest with the loss of favorable opportunity the commodities offered by heaven be destroyed (Justinian Code, Book iii, title 12).

This is the origin of the Christian Sabbath—instituted by a monster, a butcher whom the church has canonized and the Christian world calls Constantine the Great. This man, whose infamy is unparalleled in the history of mankind, a man who rejoiced to see captivs torn by wild beasts, who killed his father-in-law and his own brother, who snatched a tender son of eleven years from his sister's arms and murdered him in cold blood, who drowned his faithful wife in a tub of boiling water, who condemned his own son to a horrible death—he, the patron and protector of Christianity, created our "holy" day, and on his death-bed was baptized, and is now among the blest. However, the observance of the Sabbath was not held to be necessary until the thirteenth century, and even down to Milton's time it was not deemed any better than any other day. To sustain the assertion that Sunday is not set apart by divine or quasi-divine authority as a day of rest, or that it is necessary to observe this day more than any other, I can quote from a legion of the most celebrated ecclesiastics and theologians of ancient, medieval, and comparativly modern times—such men as Justin Martyr and Irenæus, of the second century, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, and Origen, of the third century, St. Cyril, bishop of Jerusalem, who wrote nearly fifty years after Constantine, and St. Epiphanius. The great Jerome, 400 A D., said: "Considered in a purely Christian point of view, all days are alike."

In more modern times such men as Martin Luther, Philip Melancthon, and Martin Bucer, the Holland reformer, Erasmus, Zwingle, the great Swiss reformer, and Beza, all declare that the observance of Sunday is unnecessary, and not enjoined by anyone having authority.

I shall giv but one quotation, and that from Michelet's Life of Luther, book iv, chap. 2: "As regards the Sabbath or Sunday, there is no necessity of keeping it."

John Calvin also said:

> The fathers frequently call the command for the Sabbath a shadowy commandment, because it contains the external observance of the day which was abolished with the rest of the figures at the advent of Christ. . . . The same day which put an end to the shadows admonishes Christians not to adhere to a shadowy ceremony (Calvin's Institutes, book ii, chap. 8).
> Christians, therefore, should hav nothing to do with a superstitious observance of day (Ibid).

He further said, speaking of observing Sunday and substituting it for the Jewish Sabbath: "Those who adopt it [Sunday] far exceed the Jews in the gross, carnal, and superstitious observance of the Sabbath" (Ibid.).

So much for Calvin. If the reader will turn to Chambers's Encyclopedia, he will find the following words regarding the great Scotch Presbyterian reformer, John Knox: "It is a mistake to suppose that either Sabbatarianism or asceticism was recommended by Knox."

Andrew, in his "History of the Sabbath," page 443, in speaking of Knox, wrote:

> Though the foundation of the Presbyterian Church of Scotland was laid by Knox, . . . and though that church is now very strict in the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath, yet Knox himself was of Calvin's mind as to the observance of that day.

There are many other eminent names in the theological world that I could giv in support of my assertion, such as William Tyndale, John Milton, Archbishop Cranmer, John Frith, Rev. Dr. Hessey, and others, but I hav already occupied too much space.

He who will impartially read the history of the past, will find overwhelming evidence of the falsity of the claim of those who maintain Sunday as a day of rest by divine or quasi-divine authority.

A strong and determined effort is being made to engraft into the constitution of North Dakota a clause prohibiting all work, games, recreation, or travel on Sunday, except that of necessity, excusing those who, through religious convictions, may observe some other day. This is all very well so far as it goes, but there are, at least, a very respectable minority who believe that each day is alike, so far as holiness and sanctity is concerned. Yet they are compelled to observe the Sabbath of the Christian or else be liable to punishment.

Is it equal rights to all to hav such a law upon our statutes? Are those who conscientiously believe that to work or ride for pleasure or do anything on Sunday that can be legally done on other days of the week is proper and right, to be disregarded entirely? Are they not as good as the Greek who observes Monday? The Persian who observes Tuesday? The Assyrian who observes Wednesday? The Egyptian who observes Thursday? The Turk who observes Friday? The Jew who observes Saturday? All these di erent nationalities are on the roster of naturalized citizens of the United States.

Is it fair? Is it just? Does it represent the people? Does not a Sunday law recognize a religion as a state affair? And does it not restrict personal rights and religious conviction in this commonwealth?

Let each religion and creed stand or fall upon its own merits.

Let each church pay its own taxes.

Let each day be as nature designed it, free and alike.

Let the Golden Rule for once prevail: "Do unto others as you would hav them do unto you."

SAUL.

The Portland, Ore., Liberal Convention.

Four conventions are engaged in framing constitutions for new states in the great West. Many earnest individual efforts hav been made—not altogether in vain—to influence the delegates at Olympia, W. T., to recognize the justice of the Nine Demands; but every worker to that end has realized the weakness of individual effort, and the absolute need of efficient, practical organization. Had we had an organization of the Liberals in the several territories, we could hav insured respectful consideration of our claims.

Carefully prepared leaflets, thoroughly circulated, would hav done much to educate the intelligent voters as to the justice of, and to convince them it was to their personal interest to secure, the Nine Demands. Thus we might hav influenced the choice of delegates. And after the election of delegates, how effectiv would hav been the power of unity! Even the most mercenary politician would hav been slow to oppose; and, although inclined to slight Liberals individually, would scarce venture to ignore them collectivly.

From lack of organization, the individual efforts made, although attended with much of expense and self-sacrifice, can expect but meager results. Let us not idly lament the failures of the past, but profit by the lessons of experience, and evince activ energy in the present.

Oregon has taken the initiativ, adopted a most excellent platform, and started practical organization, with officers of ability, zeal, and experience, in whom all hav the utmost confidence.

It is not, perhaps, just now advisable that Washington should form a separate organization. But it would be of very great mutual advantage to Oregon and Washington to form a joint state union; and the proposed convention at Portland, in October next, affords the best possible opportunity to do so.

We hav the assurance that the Portland convention will not be a mere display of Liberal lecturers' isms, each lecturer ventilating a pet ism, and all firing in different directions. On the contrary the lectures will be by the most able exponents, of our principles. Every lecture, especially prepared for the occasion, will, in the most clear and forcible manner, state the aims and objects of our organization, and conclude with appeals to the intelligent to investigate, and to all Liberals to prove the depth of their convictions by earnestly working for thorough and efficient organization.

The Liberal lecturers are relied on to take the lead in the spirit of self-sacrifice, and do all in their power to influence attendance, solicit contributions, and do all work the committee may require of them, without fee.

Liberal lecturers are paid at all other times for speaking; and, as perfecting efficient organization will be greatly to their ultimate advantage, no injustice will be done by accepting their gratuitous services on this occasion.

This will very greatly reduce expenses. Now, if all will evince the same laudable desire to do their full share of the work, then beyond all doubt the Portland convention will be the grandest success of any gathering of Liberals ever held in the United States.

This convention is not to be a mere surfeit of surplus lectures. The day services will be devoted to a real congress of the Liberal workers, not alone from Oregon and Washington, but from all parts of the United States, at which personal acquaintance can be cultivated, plans and methods of work compared and discussed.

The platform is the Nine Demands, all sound and solid, needing no repairing or amending; but we do greatly need time and opportunity to consult and decide on the best possible way to carry into effect its provisions, aims, and objects.

Admission to these sessions, so as to avoid the presence of objectionable outsiders, should be by non-transferable tickets issued by the committee; speeches confined to ten minutes, and strict enforcement of the rule that speakers must confine themselvs to the question before the house, each and all striving to heal all dissensions. Waive all questions of favor or disfavor of individuals, and earnestly endeavor to promote the greatest good to the greatest number.

Ere there can be a genuin national organization, there must first be a number of state organizations, whose accredited representativs or delegates shall constitute the national organization. Ere a state organization can be an effectiv reality, it must be composed of properly authorized representativs or delegates from local societies. Hence it is to the personal interest and advantage of every Liberal in Oregon and Washington to at once use all possible efforts to establish local organization.

Let us profit by the errors of the past, and not attempt to build in the clouds, beginning with the top of the chimney; nor encourage the making paupers of Liberals by inducing them to depend for the expenses of their organization on the donations of the wealthy. Let all stand as free and independent men and women, each ready and glad to do their proper proportion of the burden-bearing.

Let our organization be composed of "Liberals," those who hav the pure and ennobling principles of Liberalism in their hearts, not mere loud-talking Bible-kickers who hav left the church on account of mean acts or chronic stinginess. Let every local society be organized on strict business principles—on a pay in advance, cash basis, membership fee, and regular monthly dues. Too long our friends and neighbors hav been prejudiced—the slaves of priestcraft and superstition. Too long hav Liberals been ostracised, denounced. Surely the time has come to make an earnest, persistent effort in this glorious, sunny West in behalf of our loved ones, our friends, and ourselvs!

NOW IS THE OPPORTUNITY.

Liberals of Washington, what is your response? Will you resolve to, if possible, attend the Portland convention, meet and become personally acquainted and form a Union with the tried and true workers of Oregon; compare notes, interchange ideas; be refreshed and inspired by the thrilling eloquence of our most able lecturers; learn how best to help forward the cause, and how most successfully to organize and conduct local organization?

Why not all rally and giv Liberalism such a mighty impetus here in the Northwest as shall accelerate its triumphant progress through the whole country? Will you?

Then go at once to the post-office and send money order or registered letter addressed to C. Beal, president Oregon State Secular Union, Portland, Ore. Send such amount as you can afford to-day, no matter if the amount is small. You can remit again in a few weeks if fortune favors you. But write at once. If you cannot do any better to-day, send assurance of your being present at the convention, and pledge to contribute stated amount.

The committee should, as soon as possible, get out printing matter, advertise, etc. Ere this can be done they must make contracts for hall, music, etc. They will use prudence, care, economy, but everything should be on a scale of grandeur befitting so important an occasion.

We want at the very least a three days' Congress with a public lecture each evening, and a fourth day devoted to festivity, sight-seeing, and a banquet and grand ball.

It will greatly help to insure success if the committee can hav a supply of finance and assurance of attendance at once. Send along your contribution; it will double your interest and desire to attend. Make up your mind that you will go, and take wife and young folks along. All difficulties will melt away before fixed determination. Resolve to share the honor and glory of being present and helping to form the joint state Secular Union of Oregon and Washington, at Portland, the, up to that time, largest, most influential, and important gathering of Liberals ever assembled in the United States. And let all honest Liberals say, Amen!

Remember that the date is to be Oct. 1, 1889.

C. B. REYNOLDS.

Beats the "Jersey" Breed all Hollow!

In Draper's "Intellectual Development of Europe," vol. ii, page 57, is the following account of the sacking of Constantinople by the Catholic army of Pope Innocent III., called the "fourth Crusade," which started to rescue the holy sepulcher (?) from the "Mohammedan Infidels." The account says: "Pope Innocent himself was obliged to protest against enormities that had outrun his intentions. He says: 'They practiced fornication, incest, adulteries; they abandoned matrons and virgins, consecrated to God, to the lewdness of grooms. They lifted their hands against the treasures of the church—what is more heinous, the very consecrated vessels—tearing the tablets of silver from the very altars, breaking in pieces the most sacred things, carrying off crosses and relics.' Asses and horses were led into the churches to carry off the spoils. A prostitute mounted the patriarch's throne, and sang with indecent gestures a ribald song. The tombs of the emperors were rifled, and the Byzantines saw at once, with amazement and anguish, the corpse of Justinian, which even decay and putrefaction had for six centuries spared in his tomb, exposed to the violation of the mob. It had been understood, among those who instigated these atrocities, that the relics were to be brought into a common stock and equitably divided among the conquerors; but each ecclesiastic seized and secreted whatever he could. Thus the Abbot Martin obtained for his monastery in Alsace the following inestimable articles: 1. A spot of the blood of our savior; 2. A piece of the true cross; 3. The arm of the Apostle James; 4. Part of the skeleton of John the Baptist; 5.—I hesitate to write such blasphemy—'a bottle of milk, of the mother of God.'"

This was in 1202; and, as the "holy Virgin" was supposed to hav nursed the "infant Jesus" eleven hundred and ninety-eight years previously, it shows that she was not only prolific as a "lacist," but that her milk was of a kind not requiring ice to prevent its conversion into "bonny-clabber," in a country where, in summer, the thermometer stood at 100° in the shade.

That this wonderful milk-yielder was not preserved to the world, and the breed multiplied for the benefit of mankind, seems to controvert the Darwinian theory of "the survival of the fittest." Again, the non-evaporativ quality must not be lost sight of. Still another marvel about this milk must hav been one similar to that of the "golden water," obtained by Princess Parizade, in Arabian tales, to wit, a drop of it multiplying itself into a perennial fountain; nor must it be forgotten that this "virgin milk" was the counterpart of the wood of the "true cross," the fecundity of which was such, that a writer on relics stated that, in the thirteenth century there was wood enough in Europe of the original cross, in the shape of relics, to construct the entire British navy.

The popes cared about as much for the success of crusades as a "dog does for the fifth wheel of a carriage." When the "indulgence" milk ran low, and funds in the popish exchequer were exhausted, the last resort of the popes was to set the crusade ball a-rolling, Pope Innocent goading on the ignorant, fanatical rabble by fulminating: "Where," they (Saracens) say, "is your God, who can not deliver you out of our hands? Behold! we hav defiled your sanctuaries, we hav taken, at the first assault, your desirable places where your superstition had its beginning. Where is your God?"

To start a crusade was to set all the money in Europe a flowing, and—like the tracks of the beasts visiting the pretended sick lion in his den, which all pointed toward the den and none from it—all the money flowed into the coffers of the pope, and none away from it. By and by this sly game was detected, even by the obtuse soldiery, who found they couldn't be paid because all the money was kept in Rome.

Coming down to the present, and respecting the much bruited Catholic supremacy in America, it may be said, when the tree dies at the roots (Italy), the branches and leaves will soon feel the decay. Catholicism in America livs only by tolerance, and that is the "bid" that both political parties are offering for its votes. The same was true of the North before the war. The first shot on Sumter, or overt act, and the spell is broken, when it will be a word and a blow, and the blow will come first.

SEMPRONIUS.

Phariseeism Run Mad.

From the Pittsburgh, Pa., Times.

On the Sunday following the Johnstown disaster, when all hearts fairly b'ed and every pocket was open for the sufferers, the Pittsburgh Casino Museum threw open its doors free, only placing within easy reach a contribution box labeled: "For the sufferers at Johnstown." No price of admission was exacted, there was no performance, no actors, no show of any kind, save the famous scene of "Christ Before Pilate." The location was favorable for a contribution-box. Hundreds of citizens entered for a moment and placed in the box the evidence of their sympathy. Some gave ten cents; some twenty-five cents; some a dollar; and in more than one instance ten dollars was given. Generally the contributions were wholly regardless of the place, and there was no thought of any impropriety on the Sabbath day. It was simply a generous outflow of heartfelt benevolence. The amount so collected was $184 95. This amount was handed to the treasurer of the Times relief fund, and was a part of the $11,268 62 which it was the great privilege of the Times to hand over to the Pittsburgh relief committee.

From the correspondence printed elsewhere the public will learn that the avails of the Casino Museum contribution-box were returned to the Times on the ground that the committee could not conscientiously handle money thus collected for the relief of the destitute sufferers of Johnstown!

Banker Thompson, the treasurer of the Pittsburgh committee, loans money that earns interest three hundred and sixty-five days in the year, which, of course, includes Sundays, and nobody says he is not a good man. Banking is his business, and through it he makes his living. William McCreery, chairman of the Pittsburgh committee, is the president of a street railway company whose cars run every day in the year, collecting fares from every passenger on Sunday as well as other days. From the earnings of that company he collects his dividends. Baker Marvin bakes the bread that feeds the hungry from the grain that grows on Sundays as well as on other days. Much of that bread, by his free and liberal contribution, went to feed the starving at Johnstown, and no man refused to take the loaves. And there was no man whose family was fed by this bread who did not thank God for Baker Marvin and the bread, or who paused to question whether the grain grew or the bread was baked on the Lord's day. Does the Bible say anything about the day of the week the widow gave her mite, or would she hav been honored less if she had given it on Sunday?

But the money was made to do the work which the contributors had in view. It has gone where it will do the most good, and of few things only are we more certain than that the action, from beginning to end, has had God blessing!

MR. E. M. MACDONALD, the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, has been confined at home and disabled from editorial management, by typhoid fever, for some two weeks, and may continue so awhile longer. Correspondents who hav not received attention will accept this as explanation and apology. In view of the theory of Freethinkers that had science not been checked by Christianity it could by now hav eradicated about all zymotic diseases, we may reasonably conceive our Editor as raging and frothing against superstition in his confinement with uncommon fury, and may expect vituperativ sentiments of intensified bitterness when he is with us again—which, we may assume, all friends will join with us in wishing to be soon.

The New States.

The party of superstition does not seem to be getting much substantial benefit in the new constitutions, but at least is getting the name of its God and divers pieces of cant into those documents altogether too thickly.

In Idaho an effort was made against the introduction of the name of God in the constitution, but it failed. One of the delegates, named Pefley, refused to sign it because of its containing that name. He returned home not having pledged himself to its support, as had the other members, and having refused to accept pay for his services. In this state Mormons were cut off from the right of suffrage.

In North Dakota Delegate Bartlett, of Griggs, moved to strike out of the preamble the part referring to God. It was unnecessary, he said, and was not in the constitution of the United States. Stevens, of Ransom, and other members, opposed Bartlett, and succeeded in having adopted another preamble, which reads:

"We, the people of North Dakota, grateful to almighty God for religious and civil liberty, do establish and ordain this constitution."

North Dakota, by the way, set apart forty thousand acres of land to provide for a school of manual training and industrial education at Allendale. It has the honor of being the first state in the Union to provide for a system of this nature.

In Washington territory, on the 7th, an all-day debate took place over the clause to exempt church property from taxation. Cosgrove, who favored exempting churches and charitable institutions, said that the only reason why it was sought to tax them was that the gentlemen in the opposition were anxious to cripple the Catholic church. The question was finally settled by leaving the whole matter to the legislature. This is the way a report of the 7th reads, but later there appears the statement that "Washington has decided that all property must pay taxes." We will say on these reports that if Washington has so decided, she has done nobly; if she has left it to the legislature, still that is something, for we may yet with effort carry it our way, and she has still done well. She has, moreover, provided that the entire revenue of the school fund shall be applied to the common schools. Sectarianism of any kind or sectarian appropriations are absolutely forbidden. All this is glorious. And we feel in it a glow of triumph and of duty done, for if the men that promoted these measures were to tell the story of how they came into their advanced sentiments, we fancy that in the story there would be mentions not few of papers and books that first saw the light in this establishment. Of course pietists everywhere are indignant. The remarks of the Watchman (Baptist) will serve as a sample of their comments, and at the same time giv information on the further point of how this state did about mentioning God in the preamble. We shall see that it did quite differently from the two previously mentioned:

"Some of the new states preparing for admission to the Union seem likely to be without a shred of religious form in their fundamental laws. Washington has a constitutional convention that cannot abide even a recognition of God in a preamble. A preamble was reported in which the goodness of God was referred to, but it was at once recommitted, with instructions to strike out that clause, on the ground that it implied a union of church and state! In order to hav religious freedom, one must not allow himself to concede that there is a God! This is at the opposit extreme from the proposed religious amendment. It comes very near a profession of Atheism."

It never seems to occur to our Baptist friend to inquire of itself, Why should God be mentioned? Surely it cannot be because government has its source in God. Our most famous national document expressly declares it to hav its source in the people. If the Baptist holds otherwise, the Baptist is a traitor. Perhaps it was only to refer to the goodness of God. Why refer to that? Why not refer to the goodness of Ingersoll, and Huxley, and Darwin? There are a great many inhabitants of this land who believe that it owes its well-being a great deal more to the goodness of those gentlemen than to that of God. Each art, and each division of literature, might as fitly insist on the recognition of the goodness of its respectiv idol and leader. Why recognize anybody's goodness? A constitution is not supposed to cover everything there is in the world. It is only a particular instrument, got up for a particular and single purpose, and that purpose is civil government. Will pietists never get this into their heads? "One must not allow himself to concede that there is a God." One must not allow himself, we suppose, to concede that there is a Queen Victoria or a Mount Washington because they are not mentioned in this document. But we should hav quoted the whole of this sentence, and now go back to do it. "In order to hav religious freedom, one must not allow himself to concede that there is a God!" We are afraid that this is true. For wherever all persons hav believed firmly in the existence of a God, and there hav been no skeptics among them to throw wet blankets on their burning zeal, they hav always gone mad with fervency, pursued the fancied commands of that God into every extreme of violence and cruelty, fallen to wrathy contention among themselvs over disputed meanings, and extinguished religious liberty and every other good as well.

We will turn to Montana, where things turned out not so well as in Washington, but rather as they did in the states before-mentioned. Here God was recognized in the constitution. Secretary Wylie of the church party thus reports his experience in interviewing the delegates. He commenced with the chairman of the committee on the preamble and bill of rights:

"My paper, the chairman said, had been considered by the committee. He was opposed to every position I had maintained. He did not believe that God is the source of authority. The people are the only source. The Bible is not an inspired book, and is of no authority whatever. The next man I met was also a member of the committee, and took the same view of the subject. The report of this committee was already printed. I called the attention of these two gentlemen to the fact that the expression, 'Grateful to almighty God for the blessings of liberty,' occurs in the preamble. They said they were opposed to it, but had been outvoted in the committee. For a time every man I met was opposed to it, and believed it would not be adopted. Afterward I found a different element, and as the result proved the majority were in favor of retaining this reference to deity."

When the matter came up before the convention, Delegate Knowles opened fire against the acknowledgment of God. His points were: "It was a mixing of religion with politics, to which he was entirely opposed; it was distasteful to many of the people of Montana; it was inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States, which contains no reference to God; men who do not believe in 'almighty God' cannot hold office if this acknowledgment is retained; it was also inconsistent with the Enabling act under which this convention is assembled." Mr. Maginnis made an earnest plea in favor of retaining the acknowledgment of God. The preamble containing it was adopted. Two of the three daily papers of Helena contained editorials the next day on the subject. Both of them scored somewhat severely the members who opposed the acknowledgment. One, the Journal, maintained that there can be no government without God, for he is the source of all authority. The Herald said:

"In the discussion whether the name of God should appear in the preamble of the constitution, we fancy that some of the delegates represented their individual opinions rather than the bulk of their constituents. It is 'we the people of Montana,' and not 'we the delegates,' that will be speaking to the world when the instrument now being framed will become instinct with life. And beyond all question ninety-nine-hundredths of the people of Montana believe in a supreme being called God."

It is rather surprising that the God-acknowledgment should hav been adopted, as Montana is nearly as full of Freethought as Washington. Helena is largely Freethought in sentiment, and it is estimated that throughout the territory at least half the business houses keep open Sunday.

The agents of the National Reform Association and the American Sabbath Union while traveling through these Western states on work in these matters, also circulate everywhere their petitions for a national Sunday law. Their petitions are found on store counters, in church pews when the congregation enter, and everywhere. We will close by presenting two of them as samples. One reads:

"To the United States Senate:

"The undersigned, adult residents of the United States, twenty-one years of age and more, hereby earnestly petition your honorable body to pass a bill forbidding in the nation's mail and military service and in interstate commerce, and in the District of Columbia and the territories, all Sunday traffic and work, except works of religion, and works of real necessity and mercy."

Another reads:

"The undersigned organizations, and adult residents, twenty-one years of age or more, of the United States, hereby earnestly petition your honorable body to pass a bill forbidding, in the nation's mail and military service and interstate commerce, and in the District of Columbia and the territories, all Sunday traffic and work, except works of religion and works of real necessity and mercy, and such private work by those who religiously and regularly observe another day of the week by abstaining from labor and business, as will neither interfere with the general rest nor with public worship."

New Mexico.

In New Mexico, while a few Secularists are hoping to keep the coming constitution thoroughly free of religion, another party is working to make it even more medieval than that of any other state in the Union. This latter party is the Roman Catholic element, who are exerting themselvs to hav the school funds divided, a pro rata share to be given their religious schools. It is to be hoped that resistance to them will be prompt and vigorous. The argument to be used is that the state cannot contribute to the support of schools in which religion is taught, as to do so would be a step in the merging of civil government with ecclesiastical, which is against the American theory. But the state must continue to support a system of common schools of its own, the justification being simply that they are essential to the maintenance of a republic; and to support that system it will tax all alike. It will tax alike lovers of art who believe in having ordinary education but in addition high culture in art; Socialists who believe in having ordinary education but in addition instruction in Socialism; Jews who believe in having ordinary education but in addition instruction in Judaism; Mormons who believe in having ordinary education but in addition instruction in Mormonism, and, of course, Catholics who profess to believe in having ordinary education but in addition instruction in Catholicism. Government, these people are to understand, is for few and limited purposes; it does not do to attempt to wrest it to the advancement of each hobby that each citizen chooses to fancy. And in particular, that hobby to the advance of which Catholics wish to wrest it, is above all others the very last one to which we should permit it to be applied. For it is in regard to that very one that history exhibits its most terrific lessons of warning. Eliminating all these individual whims on which there is no agreement, and retaining only that on which there is general agreement, we retain the practice of universal common school education. And besides this recommendation of the practice, that it is the one thing wanted by all, divested of the multifarious caprices of each, there is another. This other, before alluded to, is the principle that the state is justified in adopting means necessary to its own continuance, and it is believed that education of its citizens is thus necessary. This is the theory on which our school system was started, and this is the theory on which we must continue it in despite of all that the party of slavish ignorance and superstition continues to do against it. As to New Mexico, it is hard to predict the nature of the settlement of the constitution. The Romanists are in the majority, but hav become apathetic to church interests very rapidly in the last generation, along with their neighbors of Mexico.

Christs.

We hav an account of a new religious sect that has sprung into being in Liberty county, Georgia Its adherents are negroes, though among its successiv leaders there has been one white man. It is, as a matter of course, just like all the other Christian sects and all other religions in its nature and effects. All of them are the same.

"As fast as one leader is taken from Liberty county's sable Children of the Wilderness, another springs up to take his place. Dupont Bell preached to them six weeks, and was sent to the insane asylum. Edward James assumed the leadership, and kept it until Wednesday last, when he was arrested and sent to Hinesville jail. Yesterday a slight-built, coal-black, rice-field negro filled the position of high priest. He was known as Shadrach Walthour until he went crazy through Bell and James, when he took the title of King Solomon. Now all believers address him as the King."

Of course. This is the regular progress from the fanatical exhorter's stand into the madhouse with which we are all familiar.

"A more complete demoralization among the negroes of the county could hardly be brought about by any disaster. For five miles the visitors had ridden past empty cabins and abandoned patches of corn and cotton."

This is the way Christianity has always worked. Whenever it has not been largely nullified in its effects by a pervading spirit of science and Rationalism, but has been held with fervent and undoubted belief, it has caused whole communities to abandon their useful pursuits. The very essence of that religion consists of a depreciation of the value of earthly life, and the renunciation of worldly blessings has been the chief of its moral tenets. The command was given: "Take no thought for the morrow;" "take no thought for your life, nor yet for your body . . . for after all of these things do the gentiles seek." All through the early and Middle ages material welfare was systematically disregarded, and every now and then a frenzy arose as some predicted end of the world approached, property was made over to churchmen, and fields were left untilled; and as the result famins would sweep away whole communities. For all such doings there is the clear justification of Christ's declaration that he was coming to open his kingdom, and coming quickly.

"Four people hav gone raving mad and over three hundred hav had their minds unbalanced."

More of Christianity's regular and common effects, as we noticed above.

"Four deaths hav been caused so far. One is the murder of a colored child by a crazed gang who took it off in the woods and, cutting it open, offered it as a sacrifice."

It is high time to collect all the volumes containing the tale of Abraham and Isaac, and stuff about a God being delighted by bloody sacrifice generally, and throw them all into the rivers.

"The negro James made a most horrible display of fanaticism last Sunday. The same day a brother of James and another negro named Sampson Carter went down to the camping-ground to induce James to leave there. The negro indignantly refused to do so, and struck Carter. The two men clinched, and the followers of James set upon Carter and beat him unmercifully. They stabbed him in the thigh, and cut his legs from the knee down below the calf. Carter was also struck on the head with a brick, which made a wound that Dr. Hendre pronounces fatal."

Also, at various other periods Christians, when endeavors hav been made by sensible men to restore them to reason, hav burnt their would-be deliverers at stakes, torn their flesh with pincers, scooped out their eyes, and crushed their limbs in iron instruments.

"The woman Walker, whom Bell beat in his exorcisms, has died. Three accessories to her death are in jail charged with murder."

We see no more harm in Bell's practicing exorcisms now than in Jesus's practicing them some centuries ago.

"In the Hinesville jail are eighteen, the principal one being Ed James, who bit off a woman's nose and broke her jaw."

A small matter. Why jail the man? In the religious massacres of the regular sects, they used to mutilate and kill fifty or seventy-five thousand in one day.

"King Solomon and Nebuchadnezzar are in jail."

It would be well if a good many more of these crazy fellows going about under fantastic names were in jail too—those calling themselvs "vicars of Christ," "preachers of the word," and by many other such grotesque and meaningless names.

"This is the fourth effort of Sheriff Smith. Three times he has destroyed the 'temple' and the 'ark,' in spite of James's warning that whoever touched the ark would be stricken and die."

Yes, we are not so childishly awed and frightened as we used to be. For some time we hav been getting more and more into the habit of laying hands upon all the things that priests shriek at us are "sacred," saying something terrible will befall us if we do not refrain.

"Nebuchadnezzar eats grass on all fours when an opportunity is given him to graze."

What a specimen of the effects of reading the crazing old fable-book! And so this is what Christianity brings man to!

"James claims that he is God himself."

He reminds us of a certain Jew that we once read of, that made the same claim.

"James claimed to be Christ. He proclaimed it everywhere, and the negroes fell down at his feet and worshiped him."

This should be held by future ages to be proof that this negro is Christ. For the negroes who were on the spot and thus had the best opportunity to know, accepted him, and fell down and worshiped. So future generations at a distance must take these negroes' word for it. This bit of reasoning we hav copied after that of advocates of the aforesaid Jew who made similar claims.

"His talk was rambling and plainly the vaporings of an unbalanced mind."

Still like the case of the former religious leader that we spoke of.

"The messiah of the negroes swears like a pirate and drinks whisky like a prizefighter, while the 'queen of Sheba' eats onions and is arrayed in old coffee sacks."

In swearing like a pirate the messiah of the negroes does precisely like the messiah of the Jews. That messiah of the Jews cursed everything and everybody that came within his orbit, from a fig-tree to those of mankind whom he was to sentence to everlasting fire. As to the party who arrays herself in old coffee sacks, it is known that this adoption of the singular and absurd in dress is one among the recognized mind-disordering effects of religion everywhere. Our streets are full of religion-crazed fellows going about in black shirts made to touch the ground, and Rome lately witnessed the spectacle of a person called Pecci "clapping three old hats on his head, one on top of another, and swearing he was God almighty." We scarcely imagin that a better figure was cut by John the Baptist when he came out of the wilderness than is now by the negress in question; perhaps not so good, coffee sacks being by no means incapable of picturesque arrangement, and our Georgia worthy being perchance quite a comely old colored lady, for all we know to the contrary.

"James says that before Bell's spirit entered into him it lighted on the gate post in front of his house, and he had a good view of it."

If anyone is going to start telling tales about spirits' antics, now, we can tell them right along with him as well as the next one. We hav at our side an old collection of ghost stories all just as good as this, and can promis any competitor some fun.

"He told the negroes that they had no use for money."

Certainly. All the other priests are telling people so continually. They are even so desirous of seeing their flocks disencumbered of their wealth that they will take it themselvs. They are continually receiving into their convents young women whom they hav persuaded that they do not want their money. The said money is at the same time received also, into the priests' purses.

"Said Mr. Norwood: 'The extent of the craze may be imagined, when they readily accept the declaration of a negro who has been reared among them, and whom they hav known all their lives, that he is God.'"

The extent of the craze of this Mr. Norwood may be imagined, when he thinks people of old times should hav accepted the declaration of a Jew who had been reared among them, and whom they had known all their lives, that he was God.

Christian Persecution of Spiritualists.

The arrest by orders from post-office headquarters of W. E. Reid, president of the Michigan state Association of Spiritualists, is one of the most shameless outrages that we hav known for years. The charge, as we previously stated, is that he used the mails for fraudulent purposes, in that he professed to secure communications from the spirit land to order. Why cannot these bigots see that by their action they are now bound in consistency to arrest every priest and preacher in the land on the same charge? What proof can these priests and preachers giv that their representations of possessing influence in the spirit land are more truthful? We are in hearty sympathy with the persecuted Spiritualist, and we will say that we do not believe there is one of our Materialist subscribers that is not with us in it. Whether Spiritualism is true or false has nothing whatever to do with the question whether the arrest was just. It has been understood that in this republic men had a right to hold and to promulgate just such beliefs about a future state as they saw fit, and that men had a right to spend their money for just such things as they saw fit, and if an open subversion of these principles is proposed, it is time that we know it so we can get together and make such new arrangements in regard to government as we feel in duty to our children to be necessary. The elimination of error by free discussion only, this is the principle that was in the intentions of the fathers of this republic, and it is the only one under which a free and intelligent nation can exist. This principle must be jealously guarded. If any Christian sect, or any Atheist party, or any political party, holds errors, we are all understood to be free to make use of all the powers of logic and truth to expose and convict those errors in fair and civil argument before the people; and this is all that we are understood to hav a right to do.

The Spiritualists in numerous places are holding meetings of indignation. They assert that Wanamaker issued the order in person, or if not, is responsible for it. They want him removed. The three Spiritualist societies of Grand Rapids, Mich., hav passed these resolutions:

"WHEREAS, A complaint has been entered in the United States Court by a post-office inspector, under the instructions of the postmaster-general, against a well-known medium of this city, Dr. W. E. Reid, in which it is alleged that he used the United States mails for fraudulent purposes, or, in the language of the complaint, that he did, in a paper called the Banner of Light, 'knowingly and wrongfully propose to secure communications from spirit land to order;' and,

"WHEREAS, A complaint of this nature is sweeping in its character, and threatens the rights and personal liberty not only of the said W. E. Reid, but of every professional medium in the United States, who profess to obtain messages or communications in any manner from our loved ones who hav passed from earth to spirit life; and,

"WHEREAS, We consider that such attack and prosecution is being pushed for the purpose of obtaining a test case in the matter, in order to further prosecute hundreds of other mediums, and that it is in consequence thereof nothing more nor less than Religious Persecution; and,

"WHEREAS, The time has arrived for all true Spiritualists (whether mediums or otherwise) to put on the whole armor and fight manfully for the cause nearest and dearest to their hearts; therefore,

"Resolved, That we do hereby feel that our religious rights and privileges as Spiritualists are being trampled upon, and that the peace and liberty of every medium and Spiritualist in the United States is in danger.

"Resolved, That in consideration of said facts, we extend to Dr. W. E. Reid our sympathy, fidelity, and united support as Spiritualists and mediums, and will do all that lies in our power, with the help of the spirit world, to assist him and the cause of Spiritualism; and be it further

"Resolved, That immediate steps should be taken to select a defense committee to raise funds for that purpose, to consist of three persons, one from each of the Spiritual societies of this city. That said committee shall use such means as to them shall seem best to place before the Spiritualists of the United States the facts in Dr. Reid's case, with a view of thorough organization and raising funds for a proper defense therein, that Spiritualism may be vindicated, and that right and justice may prevail."

WHAT man in America owns the most land, and how much does he own? This inquiry is made of us by our subscriber Mr. McMullen, of Dodgeville, Wis. Will some reader kindly furnish the information through our columns?

IT is said that the letters W. C. T. U. mean, "Women constantly torment us."

Letters from Friends.

CHARLEVOIX, MICH., June 30, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: The inclosed postal order and my long continuance as one of your subscribers speak my sentiments better than any words that I can command. I can do without many things, but I must hav my Sunday reading. Therefore, on this quiet Sunday morning, whilst some of our God-fearing business neighbors are busied in dampening their teas and sanding their sugars preparatory to going to church, I thought I would prepare to send you, not my blessing, but what will be to you of much more value, my year's subscription. Yours for Universal Mental Liberty,

ROBERT MILLER.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH., July 19, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: There was a meeting held at St. Mark's church, Grand Rapids, Mich., to consider desecration of the Sabbath. There was an Adventist preacher present, Rev. Mr. Moore, and he would hav told them some truths that would hav been to their advantage, had he not been stopped short by Bishop Gillespie informing him that they did not want any more of that. This is what bishops are for—to corrupt the ministers and not allow them to preach the honest truth from the heart; and they are instructed by the pope. If ministers do not know enough without instructions from bishops, it is time they did. No wonder the Sabbath is desecrated by such dishonest practice. CHARLES SACH.

STITZER, WIS., July 25, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3.80, eighty cents for "Modern Science Essayist," Nos. 1 to 8, inclusiv, and $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, the paper that shows up the pious frauds that the people hav been compelled to believe or be deprived of the privileges of pagan respectability. In my estimation all of the testimony concerning the Christian religion proves too much. It breaks down of its own weight, and is sustained in power by law, persecution, and fraud. The people are compelled to believe it and thereby deprived of the power to reason for themselvs. Therefore true knowledge is at a discount in the Christian churches. Faith, miracle-working, and devotion to a savage, unreasonable God of their own manufacture is what keeps them in the fog of uncertainty and susperstition. WM. A. GRISWOLD.

KIRKSVILLE, MO., July 29, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Ex-Rev. Maxey, in denouncing Spiritualism in the last issue, says: "Those communications, both pro and con, that hav previously appeared in our paper, remind me of sportsmen shooting at so long a range that they knew they had not reached the target, and no one knew which came the nearest." I would ask Mr. Maxey if he has any knowledge that he has reached the target, or come any nearer to it than they. Again, he says: "'Tis a pity that men and women of such talent will fool away this short life, when so much good could be accomplished, practicing such superstitious legerdemain." This is an accusation of dishonesty. I would ask Mr. Maxey if he was honest, and how much time he has fooled away in preaching and singing "Spirits are hovering round."

Mr. Tuttle, in his article on science in the last issue, says: "I would not believe the existence of spirit organisms should I see, hear, and feel them." In this he names a fact, or what would by the evidence be a fact, and then sets forth his ability to control his mind or belief against evidence to disbelieve the fact. Is this scientific?

I do not claim to be a Spiritualist, but do claim to hav had sufficient evidence, yes, positiv, beyond a possibility of fraud, that invisible intelligent forces operate through certain persons independent of their own minds. WM. HART.

TORONTO, CAN., July 31, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: When I read of Christian missionaries making inroads on the religions of people foreign to us, who hav been in the habit of worshiping images of their own design, and who hav mechanical skill enough to construct a god, I cannot but observe the difference between them. The one in his barbarous state displays ambition and ingenuity in erecting a god to which he can bow down and see what he is praising; the other, a narrow-minded excuse for a human, incapable of giving expression to a thought of his own, or of presenting an original idea to the world, whose mind is shrouded in mystery and almost devoid of any scientific speculation or investigation, worships something he can neither see, hear, nor explain, but simply tries to substitute one kind of ignorance for another. Evidently the demand for the latter is rapidly decreasing.

Now let us note the difference between these and some of the Liberal lights, such as Washington, Lincoln, Franklin, and Paine—all Freethinkers. Although all that was mortal of them has passed away, they hav made the nation quake with the thunders of their fiery eloquence, and their scientific and philosophical researches hav been chiefly instrumental in unraveling many of the mysteries in which generations hav been shrouded, and they hav left a stamp upon superstition which cannot be erased. Their chief aim in life was the salvation of their country and the emancipation of the human race. In these efforts they hav laid the hand of the people on that which is right, where it can never loose its hold but will increase in power as the years roll round, and hav won fame for them that will hand their names down to posterity as the most illustrious that the world has ever known. J. B. VAIL.

COUNOIL BLUFFS, IA., July 23, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me your catalog of scientific works. I am trying to find out something about natural science, especially geological, and I do not care to study works that are on anything but a material basis. I cannot conceive of anything immaterial. With me, what is immaterial, is nothing. If I study the anatomy of man, I do not like to be told, of the brain, that it is the organ through which an immaterial mind, soul, spirit, or intelligence acts, in controling the physical organism. I cannot conceive of nothing controling matter, much less creating it.

Matter is indestructible; and is it not just as natural to suppose that it is self-existent and not creatable, as to think that some unknowable, immaterial fetich squirmed into an existence that is no existence, and became the author of the whole material universe?

I do not believe that the human mind is capable of conceiving a something that is really immaterial, not composed of matter. Yet we spend months of a college course, and often years of our after lives, in the study of psychology, or the science of the soul, and an ethics, or moral philosophy, based upon this ghostly "science." Not satisfied with this, our teachers attempt to rest matter itself, or the science which deals with it, on an immaterial basis.

What would a man say if an architect were to propose to erect him a house of stone upon a foundation of straw? Much less can we afford to base material laws upon a foundation that, to say the least, we do not know to exist.

When we discover phenomena that we cannot ourselvs explain, we should not, by attributing it to the "unknowable," attempt to baffle the researches of all who are to succeed us.

Be sure and send catalog at once. I am on the road, and I buy copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER wherever I can get them, and giv them to my friends, wherever I go, and ask them to send in their names, if they like it. B. H. M.

PORTSMOUTH, O., July 21, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: The Seventh Day Adventists hav bid Portsmouth adieu. They went to Mt. Vernon, where the annual camp-meeting of that sect will soon be held. Their departure leaves us in as much doubt as ever concerning the prophecies and the second coming. An Adventist recently called on an unbeliever to show him how plain the word of God was, how harmonious, how smooth! Said the Adventist: "Just look at Nathan. He prophesied that the future would bring forth great chariots on wheels, that would move through the land, and would resemble a flaming torch. And so it has. We hav the railroads and their ponderous machines and long trains."

"That's all very nice," said the Liberal, "but that prophecy will fit other things besides the railroad and its trains. And another thing, Nathan certainly never dreamed of electric light. He has utterly failed to mention our electric light trains. Any night you can see the 'Fast, Flying Virginian' pass on the C. & O., and I'm sure you will not say it looks much like a flaming torch. It is illuminated from one end to the other with electric light, and resembles the sun's rays, if you please." The Adventist had business in another part of the city and departed.

Rev. (?) Fred. Baltzer has, the papers say, received a call from on high to preach in Pittsburgh. It is funny how a little raise in salary will make the preacher's God "call," while a widow's prayers are unheeded and her son is drowned. The Jewish God seems to do little else than numbering the hairs of your head, noting the sparrow's fall, and hearkening to the jingle of silver coin.

There has been a great change in this country in the last twoscore years as regards religion. Hell is not half so hot, and the church applauds the milliner and the dressmaker. Twenty-five years back it was thought in this locality that the "greenbrier" hoopskirts worn at that date were of the devil, and as a result some of the sky-pilots locked one side of their church door, thus keeping the wearers of the "greenbrier" out, and making it a tight squeeze for those who wore them not to get in. I am at a loss to know why David, Solomon, et als were permitted to expire so early. They missed half their fun by not keeping up with the band wagon, and taking part in the festivities and religious follies of Scioto county twoscore years ago. WILL S. ANDRES.

HIGHLANDS, N. J., July 20, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: It has been a long time since I wrote a line to our stanch old friend THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I trust that a few now will not be amiss, if only to let our coworkers in Freethought and Liberalism know amidst what a hot-bed of mixed-up superstition and ignorance a little band of us hav to exist, and that we gain an occasional link to our chain notwithstanding.

I am sorry to say that our financial inability does not permit the hiring of a good lecturer, and for any of us here to argue with the gang of hypocritical cut-throats that infest this place with a view to getting them to lay aside their bigoted opinions long enough to consider or even read our side of the question is difficult. It is rather strong terms to use when I say "hypocritical cut-throats," but when a church has for its great mogul, both socially and financially, a man who does not work for a living and has not for five or six years, except about one year in prison and a few months roaming over the country with Salvation Army scouts, it is high time such Christians should be apprized of their appropriate name. Yet those people are considered models of goodness, and in a civilized community too, while the few of us who dare love ourselvs and families, and bring up our children in the light of reason and truth instead of clouding their brain with superstition, hav to take a back seat in what is called society and be considered fit subjects for hell.

They tell us of their God, so good, so kind, and all, yet there are so-called Christians in this place who, after giving their scanty mite to the church and hearing the "Praise God for that" pronounced, are probably without means enough to procure a good dinner on Sunday, or a pair of shoes for their children. They will still praise a God who is mean enough to suffer such to be the circumstances. Why will people praise God, work for God, giv their last mite for God's sake, when they know that the same amount of praise, the same amount of labor (and often less), together with the same amount of money, will save their aged parents and family (to say nought of their neighbors) from starving before their very eyes, and having a pauper burial, which is frequently the case in our midst? And yet we on all sides hear, Praise God for that. I must say truly they are an ignorant set. If a Liberal—or Infidel, as they term it—shakes hands with a church pillar or a minister, well, it's "Praise God for that; he is turning, recanting," etc. If, on the other hand, any member of the family dies, no matter whether of disease or old age, "Praise God for that. The lord is sending his mysterious messenger to draw us closer to him."

Well, let them praise God to their hearts' content. Some day they will see, as Puck says, "What fools these mortals be." But while I hav told of a few things the Christians praise God for here, I hope you will kindly permit me to add my little prayer in conclusion of this letter.

Praise God from whom all tortures come,
O praise him with throbbing brain.
Praise God, who scalding tears hath wrung
From your eyes with torturing pain.

Praise God, who is deaf to human cry,
Though he overlooks all the land,
While by floods and fires his children die,
Yet he never lends a hand.

Praise God, who through the inspired word says,
When in trouble call on me,
Yet scorns the sick and dying bed
And the thousands drowned at sea.

Praise God, who looks on the starving poor
With a heart full of infinit love
And promises all who the end endure
A home in his mansion above.

The priests and pounders of that orthodox book
Over which so much blood has been shed,
For a new field of labor will soon hav to look,
For both God and the devil are dead.

Respectfully, CAPT. W. L. JOHNSON.

CLEVELAND, O., July 28, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Two months ago my brother died. He was a Materialist, as I hav always been. Two weeks ago I was prevailed upon to visit a neighbor who had a medium visiting her. With what different feelings could I now read the McArthur-Priestley debate than were my feelings before seeing her; and also how many lessons do I deduce (more than you intended) from your editorials, "Facts" and "Theories!" It is plain to me, as yet, that the theories of Spiritualism should be all wrong—but what are the facts? Before my brother's death I had a premonition of it. I am still not so flighty but that I can see the logic of my old argument against premonitions to others (this being my first experience with anything allied to mind mystery), namely, What is the use of a warning to the effect that you're to be hit with a club if it doesn't save you from being hit? But to facts. I am a job printer. Two weeks before my brother died, not having heard of his sickness, my hands could hardly be restrained from "setting up" his death notice, nor could my mind refrain from wondering as to whether it should be his initials, his first name abbreviated, or spelled in full. This was in the forenoon; in the afternoon I learned of his sickness. What is the explanation? Immediately upon touching the medium's hands she said to me: "Your aunt, your mother's sister, who died before you were born and when she was a girl, appears to me [the medium], saying, 'You are a disbeliever in the immortality of mind; but you are mistaken.'" Then my brother appeared, giving a discourse on how to act in this life, also on life beyond the grave. He also told my projects; of my applying for a position in the government printing-office at Washington, and of my desire to become a correspondent from that city to Eastern papers—things that no one there could know. Then my father and mother were both described. The strangest thing, in my opinion, was her giving my dead aunt's name, "Deborah," a strange, old-fashioned name, almost forgotten by myself. What is the explanation? What are the facts? I don't know; but to reject evidence that proves to your mind is more harmful to yourself and the general intellectual advance of mankind than to reject before you hav received evidence directly; because the former might imply a great many reasons for non-belief, while the latter would mean want of confidence in one's own reasoning powers. And when a person gets to that pass he has come to a standstill forever on that particular subject, and is undoubtedly injuring his receptiv faculties as to everything new in mind or physics. One should always remember that it is one's own judgment that is appealed to, not somebody else's.

Honor to him who, self-complete, alone,
Carves to the grave one pathway all his own,
And heeding nought that man may think or say,
Asks but his own soul if doubtful of the way.

While not being able to answer my own questions, yet I am ready to acknowledge that he who can answer them is, in my opinion, greater than a Newton or a Darwin. Then think of the consolation of knowledge of immortality to the living, and the knowledge of its attainment by the overworked, tired dead. I am thinking now of my brother, who was a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER and a great admirer of Ingersoll; he always kept a portrait of our great orator in a conspicuous place, one given to him by an Infidel artist friend; a brother who, after working eighteen years for one firm, died at the age of thirty-two, a kind husband, temperate in all things, just to all—died of the drudgery of life. Let us hope that sometime, somewhere, all things are made even.

Too well I know that to truth seekers a hope, a wish, is not a fact; also, well I know that a Materialist, in the mind order, is generally not without a vein of Spiritualism in him, proved by his greater interest in psychology; but he is such a Spiritualist that he does not let his heart or wishes control his brain, or let his affections control his reason. If I know myself, such am I—for behold, here is another fact which does not agree with mediumistic claims. We had a communication, so called, from a young lady friend who went on a visit to Johnstown just before the flood, in which she announced her death. Yesterday we had a postal from her, saying she was alive and well. By the way, is it not strange that of all the dead of that valley none were warned by dead friends of their awful end? Surely some were worth saving? To be gentle with all loving men and women whose belief is that of Spiritualism, let us grant that spirits cannot interfere with the laws of nature. Anyway, this is a hard world, with no hope to the hard workers, unless there be another world, for

> To that which is immortal, time can do no wrong,
> And things which never die, forever must be young.

ROSWELL, N. M., July 20, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Posthumous conversions and recantations by Freethinkers are as freely manufactured and promulgated in our Southwestern territories, isolated as we are (sometimes verbally and sometimes by publication, attributed to lesser lights than Thomas Paine, Benjamin Franklin, Thomas Jefferson, et al.), as they are in the more civilized East. Slanders, pure and simple, crush out the horrors of death by that more terrible calamity, the robbing of the dead of the fixed principles of his life, of the pride of his convictions, holding his memory up to the world as that of a coward, and branding his whole virtuous and honorable life a long and living lie. Human life is the legitimate prey of the lion, death; calumny is the jackal that preys on the dead and putrid corpses of the slain.

In the month of April last, our community was called to regret the death of one of our most honored citizens, Samuel Cunningham, Sr., a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER for many years, aged sixty-eight years. He was a man of limited theoretical education, but remarkable moral, mental and physical ability. He was studious, patient, persevering, conscientious, and, up to twenty-five years ago, he made the Bible and the teachings of Christ, the prophets, and apostles, his constant study. Twenty-five years ago he repudiated his former conditional belief in the Bible, and has since lived a serene, honest, and abstemious life, devoting his talents and energies, with the assistance of his admirable wife, in training a family of five sons and one daughter in the broad paths of honesty and industry, and they hav not disappointed the hopes of the universally honored old couple.

From earliest manhood, Mr. Cunningham spent many leisure hours in studying the Bible, with a view to its adaptation to some one or the other of the numerous religious sects. The result, as stated, was its utter repudiation as a medium of truth, and as a guide to happiness. He died of congestion of the brain, with wife and children surrounding his bed. Rev. Caleb Maul, a Baptist minister, called at the house after the old gentleman had been dead for more than an hour and a half. During his visit he suggested to the stricken wife, that he should be allowed to make some remarks at the grave. The old lady, distracted by grief, looking for sympathy in every friendly face, not knowing what she said, nor understanding the tenor of the request, consented. She knew, as did the sons, that, could the dead hav spoken, he would hav, with benignant smile, waved away the medium of spiritual consolation; but, as the mother had consented, they, with the fealty and veneration which they hav always exhibited to the mother, uttered no word of dissent, and the Christian preacher, Maul, did speak at the grave. He announced that the dead, in life, was a Freethinker, and said no word of conversion or recantation, but held up the character and the life of Samuel Cunningham as a great and good example to the youth of our land; lauded his works, his virtues, his life. Yet, within one short week after his body was consigned to the tomb, rumors were rife in the neighborhood, that he had sought spiritual comfort on his deathbed, and repudiated all the principles of a long lifetime—filching from the dead, robbing a corpse, branding as a coward, a weak, unsubstantial imbecil, the body and mind of a man ever honored for his strength of purpose, his stern adherence to conviction, and of most excellent judgment.

These reports hav much disturbed the minds of the family of the deceased. Disgusted and indignant, they deny and, in their truthfulness, denounce as false, all such insinuations, aimed at the honor of the dead husband and father, but they might as well seek to thwart the felon wolf, with his prey between his fangs, as to rescue the reputation of a dead Atheist from the libelous tongues of a sanctimonious Christian rabble.

I do not doubt but volumes of confessions and recantations are already in manuscript and "ready for type," which will appear almost simultaneously with the death of Robert G. Ingersoll, in all the Christian periodicals of the world.

For the outraged and indignant family of the deceased Freethinker, Samuel Cunningham, Sr., and his and their friends, I am, Faithfully yours, P. F. GARRETT.

MR. EDITOR: As our TRUTH SEEKER is devoted to the discussion and elucidation of almost every important question, I thought I would ask the favor of a little space to state a few rather curious facts, and ask the "wise men of the East," and West, too, for that matter, to explain the phenomena they present. All science is based on facts, and as every known fact assists in the correct settlement of every question or science on which it bears, we cannot afford to ignore any of them. When I was a boy there lived neighbors to my father in western Pennsylvania a quiet, civil, industrious family of Scotch Irish descent, and of course Presbyterians. It so happened that this family, consisting of father, mother, daughter, and maiden aunt, was annoyed by the disturbance of articles of furniture and kitchen utensils in the house, produced by some occult or to them hidden force. The family, fearing that if it were known it would increase the annoyance, strove to keep it secret. But the phenomena would occasionally occur in the presence of a neighbor, and after a time it became "noised abroad," engaging the attention of the people, and becoming the engrossing topic of conversation in the community. Finally people came from "all the region round about;" as many as three hundred persons were on some days present to witness the strange and wonderful proceedings, and, if possible, ascertain the cause thereof. They saw nearly everything in the house tossed about by invisible hands in wild confusion. Bedding was thrown from the beds onto the floor; dishes were thrown from the shelves; buckets, pots, etc., empty or otherwise, were upset and rolled about the floor; ears of corn were husked by some invisible agency, and conveyed through the air from the shocks, eight or ten rods distant, and thrown upon the roof of the house or down the chimney. The actual husking could not be seen, but the ears of corn became visible soon after leaving the shocks, and remained so until they fell upon the roof of the house, where they were picked up and examined by scores of men who, at different times, climbed upon the roof for that purpose. The invisible operators, when asked to do so, would throw corn, potatoes, rocks, water, or almost any other article down the chimney. Water was sometimes thrown over the people as they stood gazing at the strange occurrences. On one occasion Belle Ward, a girl who, with the rest, was gazing at the doings, dared the hidden operators to throw water on her, when immediately, from some invisible source, what seemed gallons of water were poured upon her head, wetting her thoroughly. These are but a few of the actual occurrences which took place in this mysterious manner for years, more notably in the fall months. Of course, the great question then was the cause of these phenomena. I used to listen eagerly to the discussion of the various proposed theories. The vast majority of that community were Scotch-Irish Calvinistic Presbyterians. They believed in a horned, long-tailed, cloven-footed devil as firmly as in God himself, and as this noted person was the natural enemy of God and man, and was constantly "going about like a roaring lion, seeking whom he might devour," many thought it altogether the work of his infernal machinations. They held that he and his imps were holding high carnival—a regular devilish picnic, so to speak—in that neighborhood. With a satanic grin on his countenence and his tail curled over his back, he was gleefully plotting and executing all this mischief. Others thought it the work of some departed human spirit or spirits (as our Spiritualists would now), who were wickedly revenging some foul play they had suffered in life. But this theory was opposed as being contrary to "sacred writ," it teaching that such spirits were not allowed to roam at will, but like the rich man, as soon as they died "lifted up their eyes in hell," and that all such, with the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah, were "suffering the vengeance of eternal fire." This view was confirmed by many of the church poets. Dr. Watts, speaking of what a good or evil spirit does at death, says:

> Up to the courts where angels dwell,
> It mounts triumphing there,
> Or devils plunge it down to hell
> In infinit despair.
> Tempests of angry fire shall roll
> To blast the rebel worm,
> And beat upon his naked soul
> In one eternal storm.

Another says:

> A point of time, a moment's space,
> Will bear you to yon heavenly place,
> Or shut you up in hell!

But I am digressing, and will return to the original and important questions. What caused these phenomena? Two important and undeniable elements of the manifestations were force and intelligence. These things were not done in a corner, or with lights turned down, or in a cabinet, or in the presence of a few select friends, but in the bright light of day—"before all Israel and the sun." Collusion was impossible. Perhaps the simplest solution of the matter is the one given by Spiritualists, but is that the solution science gives? Who will tell? W. W. WALKER.

RED OAK, MO., July 28, 289.

MR. EDITOR: I see a notice in San Francisco Freethought of a Fourth of July celebration at Molalla, Cal. (or Oregon), which was opened and closed without prayer. I wish to tell all the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER and all the lovers of an unsectarian government of another place where this great day was celebrated without any superstitious cant, where the grand old stars and stripes floated high, and where a Freethought lecturer stepped grandly and proudly upon the national rostrum and gave what even the majority of the Christians acknowledged to be the best Fourth of July oration they ever heard.

Well, I will go more minutely into the details of the affair myself, and a young man, by name (but not profession) Christian, went to work to get up, as they call it here, a Fourth of July picnic. We first engaged three young ladies to prepare declamations for the occasion. Miss Senna Charles spoke; Jennie McNeal and Miss Ida Flood spoke "The Liberty Bell," and Miss Nora Christian spoke "The Sinking of the Alabama," all of which was appropriate for the occasion, and was given in a style that showed both good training and excellent talents, and did honor not only to the three young ladies but to the very art of elocution. I think it hard to tell which carried away the laurels of championship, but to say the least, they all deserve the highest praise for their courage and ability.

Well, we engaged these young ladies, and I wrote to Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel and Rev. J. J. Martin, a very noted speaker of this country, to giv the main orations, one in the forenoon and one in the afternoon. They both promised to come. Then we had our bills struck, and everybody had to say something about it. Some said Martin would not come, others said that they knew that woman would not be there. Others said that that woman was an Infidel and that nobody ought to come to hear her. But the more sensible ones said, "It does not make any difference what she is so she is a good speaker and makes a good, patriotic speech."

I wrote Mrs. Krekel that I would meet her at the railroad on the afternoon of the 3d. Well, the 3d came and I went to the railroad. The 4:30 o'clock train was on time and I had no difficulty in picking out Mrs. Krekel from among the mixed-up lot of passengers that disembarked. A well-dressed, fine-looking lady, a little above the average hight, with very large hazel eyes that could speak by most eloquent expressions the sentiments of a loving and tender soul and a powerful mind, or burn with flashes of indignation at the thought of injustice—as we all had a chance to see in her reply to remarks of the reverend in his oration. A lady of fine appearance, a little above middle age, with hair considerably gray; one who makes you feel perfectly at home in her company. This, briefly, is a description of Mrs. Krekel.

On the morning of the Fourth at 9 o'clock the procession was formed, headed by the Red Oak band, and marched to the ground; and at 9:30 the exercises were opened by music by the band, followed by a declamation. Then the Rev. J. J. Martin was introduced to the audience by Mr. William Christian, and for an hour and a half the people listened to a very able and eloquent address, except the last part. I must say that Mr. Martin deviated from his promis—viz., to stick squarely to patriotism—and for at least half an hour resorted to that fort so sacred to sky-pilots—personal abuse and slang about Agnosticism and Freethought, and insulting slurs about woman suffrage and about women, like Mrs. Krekel, who had the courage to get on the rostrum and defend the principles of woman's rights and of universal mental liberty. For instance, he said: "It does not take any brains to be an Agnostic; any saphead can be a disbeliever." He said faith plowed the fields and sowed the grain and reaped the harvest, while Infidelity sat on the fence and said, "It can't be done; I don't believe you can do it." And so on, with a lot of stuff that I do not remember and would not mention if I did.

Then the chairman announced Mrs. Krekel to speak at 2:30 P.M., and dismissed the audience for dinner. Now, I want it understood that Mrs. Krekel sat and listened like a lady, with all patience, to every insult and slur that the reverend had to offer. But when it came her time to speak, the reverend, oh, where was he? Ask of Mrs. Krekel, as she far and wide strewed his fragments about. At sharp 2 he had to start sixteen miles to meet a train at 6:30. A little strange that it takes four and a half hours to drive sixteen miles. It takes a preacher that long when an early start will take him out of the sound of a reply to his slang by such a speaker as Mrs. Krekel.

At 2:30 I had the honor and great pleasure of introducing Mrs. Krekel to a larger audience than that which listened to the reverend. She gave about ten minutes to a reply to what the parson had said, and I wish I was able to giv in detail what she said. I shall hav to content myself by saying it was just immense. Then she gave us the best oration I ever heard. Many who sat on the back seats left their seats and came as near the platform as they could get and stood up in order to get closer. Women sat on the hard board seats for an hour and a half and listened with breathless silence and infinit patience to catch every word. Men young and old stood for the same length of time without a murmur, leaning impatiently forward not willing to miss a single sentence. A friend of mine came to me and said: "It would hav done you good to hav been standing where I was at the back of the platform and heard the comments after she got through and the crowd began to break up. One old man said she just beat the preacher out of sight. Another one remarked that it was the best speech he ever heard. Another old fellow went up and took Mrs. Krekel by the hand and said, 'Madam, I want to thank you for your defense of labor. I think it was the grandest thing I ever heard.' In a word, the praises were without number, and I believe every one came from the very soul of the one that spoke them. In short, it seemed as though some strange spell of enchantment had come over all."

I was perfectly delighted with the result. She gave a lecture that night on the cause and cure of crime, to which we charged an admittance of ten cents. We had an inclosure of canvas around the platform and seats. One Christian lady who was heard to say that she would rather giv ten cents to stay away, was known to slip around on the outside with several others and persuade some little girls to hold back the curtains so they could see and hear. I do not tell this to cast any discredit on those of my Christian friends who did come in and pay their way and listen like ladies and gentlemen to every word, all of whom, so far as I know, were well pleased.

I had the honor on the morning of the 5th of taking Mrs. Krekel back to the railroad, and I must say I never had anyone make as deep an impression on me in my life in so short a time. I hope the good impression she made on me will never hav occasion to change.

Well, in everything the celebration was a grand success. The orations and lecture and declamations were a literary feast, for generally in this part of the country on such occasions the time is taken up by and the entertainment consists of, first a prayer, then what they call an oration, which generally consists of a few ignorant and meaningless statements, and a lot of abuse of Infidels, and especially Thomas Paine and Robert G. Ingersoll, which winds up with advice to young men to not read the writings of these bad men.

Your true friend, S. P. WOOD.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Sergeant Jasper.

Ships of England rode at anchor, stately ships from o'er the sea,
Rode at anchor in the sunshine, two by two and three by three.
From Fort Moultrie came an answer to the summons they had sent;
"No surrender; we await you for the battle well content."
Old Fort Moultrie, dark and gloomy, with its ramparts long and low,
Over which the patriot banner flapped defiance to the foe.

Admiral Sir Peter Barker looked toward the fort and laughed;
"We can break down their defenses with the weakest of our craft.
What care I for wooden breastworks of palmetto, or of pine?
Bid the ships prepare for action; let the Bristol lead the line!"

And from noonday until sunset smoke of battle sought the sky;
From the land and from the water groans and curses rose on high;
While in Charleston, stricken Charleston, queenly town beside the sea,
For their loved ones, their defenders, wives and mothers bent the knee.
'Mid the fiercest of the conflict, crash of shot and shriek of shell,
Suddenly the flagstaff parted and Fort Moultrie's banner fell.
Who will raise the fallen banner? In the trenches there it lies,
And the man who ventures thither for his daring surely dies.
Sergeant Jasper, child of glory, whom the world will not forget,
Caught the rammer of his cannon, sprang upon the parapet;
Raised the soiled and ragged banner, 'mid the tumult and the strife,
With as careful touch and tender as it were a thing of life;
Lashed it to the cannon rammer, proudly sought his post again;
While above him and around him flew the shower of iron rain.
From that staff the flag of Jasper floated till the fight was done;
Till the gallant Carolinians had the battle bravely won.
Then his comrades gathered round him, caught their hero by the hand—
"We will follow at your bidding, we will giv you chief command!
In the name of truth and justice, where the flags of battle wave,
Who so worthy to be leader as the bravest of the brave?"

Said the hero of the fight:
"Can I read, or can I write?
Giv the leadership to me,
One who knows not A from C?
My good friends, it shall not be,
As I am I keep my stand
Till these English leave the land."

And the man who served so well
When the flagstaff snapped and fell,
In the glorious days of yore
Died a sergeant, nothing more.

Johnny Graves.

I remember, when I went to school at the old red schoolhouse, a boy by the name of Johnny Graves. He was a big, stout, overgrown fellow, remarkably large for his age, for he was at that time only twelve.

He was not pretty at all, or wholesome-looking, his face being liberally bespattered with great brown freckles, and his head covered with a thatch of coarse hair. He used to wear a blue and white checked gingham pinafore, made high in the neck and tied in the back with tape strings. There were sleeves to the pinafore that reached to his hands. He was singular-looking in this attire, and he always wore a grin upon his face that added to his quaint appearance.

As you may hav divined, there was something the matter with Johnny. In fact, he was what is termed an "innocent," or, in another word, a simpleton. Some would pronounce his a case of arrested brain development.

The boys of the school bestowed upon him the euphonious title of Harnee in Turbee. He was the butt of the whole school. I well remember one day in particular. The boys had been throwing what is termed "spit-balls" at poor under-witted Johnny, and the last one aimed at him adhered to the end of his thick, chubby nose, as was intended by the thrower. I always thought the ball had been dipped in glue or mucilage in order that it would adhere the more readily.

Harney in Turbee sat and gazed vacantly at the scholars, who tittered audibly at the droll picture presented by the silly child. Presently, however, the teacher discovered what was going on, and I shall always remember how she talked to the scholars for thus abusing a poor, half-witted boy like Harney. She was a very sweet and patient little lady, this teacher, but was lacking in firmness. What pains she took with the stupid Harney trying to teach him the alphabet! But the ABC's conveyed no impression to his dull and unawakened brain.

His most prominent characteristic seemed to be destructivness. He delighted in torturing insects, yet did not seem to know that it was torture. He seemed to find great delight in catching flies and beheading them. I hav seen his desk at school literally covered with flies that he had slain in battle. Finally, he became such a disturbing element in school, distracting the scholars' attention from their studies to such an extent, that the teacher was obliged to dismiss him for good and all. So Harney came to school no more. Late in the autumn of the year of his dismissal a malignant distemper went through the town. Poor, demented Harney was among the first victims. I was not sorry when the news came that the boy was dead, for had he lived he would never hav amounted to anything, and would always hav been the butt of the thoughtless and evil-disposed, of which every community has its share.

I trust that the boys and girls who read the Children's Corner will never be guilty of such reckless wickedness as abusing or misusing the unfortunate who are maimed, deformed, or deficient in intellect.

Such cruelty denotes a bad disposition, and I would shrink from a person who could be unkind to one who was in any way unfortunately born. Says Cowper:

I would not enter on my list of friends,
Though graced with polished manners and fine sense,
(Yet wanting sensibility) the man
Who needlessly sets foot upon a worm.

How much less would I call him friend who could be cruel to a poor human being bending beneath the weight of misfortunes that cannot be ameliorated!

The bravest are usually the gentlest, and always treat with kindness those afflicted with physical or mental weakness.

Now, you who may chance to read this sketch, please be very careful in all you do and say respecting those less fortunate than yourself. Be kind, patient, and tender toward all, especially so to those who suffer from any cause whatever.

I recall a beautiful incident that happened in the city of Boston not long ago. School was just let out. The children, full of life and gayety, were running along laughing and frolicking toward their several homes. Presently they came upon a poor, aged drunken man, and some began jeering and throwing sticks and stones at him. Finally, the man commenced to cry, and fell down on the curbstone. One dear little girl ran to him, and gently wiped the tears from his eyes with her apron. "He is somebody's grandpa," said she, as she went on her way, "and don't hurt him any more." There was a whole sermon in her remark. Miriam.

Which Was Best?

Vacation was over, and the Gladston Seminary girls, pretending to be half sorry, but really quite resigned to taking up work again, were talking over the summer.

"We went to Campobello," said a fashionable looking girl, with bangs and bangles, "and we did hav the gayest time! Maud St. Clair was at the Owen, and we walked and talked and rowed together. Such fun!"

"I wouldn't go to the sea for worlds!" said Kate May, scornfully. "We were at the mountains; that is, we girls. Mamma couldn't go. Grandma was ill, and she had to stay with her."

"We went camping," put in another. "Nobody need tell me about fun in the clothes. I wore blue flannel and lay about on the grass from morning till night."

"Here comes Nan," said a fourth. "She's burnt enough for two."

"Come here, Nan, and tell us what you did!" "Where did you go?" arose the chorus, for Nan was the popular girl of the class.

"Oh, I don't go anywhere," she answered, good-naturedly.

"Not anywhere!" "Stayed in Gladston!" "Weren't you dull? How in the world did you fill up your time?"

Nan began to count off the items on her fingers:

"I made bread, took care of the baby, mended stockings, washed dishes——"

"Stop! stop! Where were you house-maid? And did they giv you a character when you left?"

"Yes," replied Nan, with composure, though a flush of pleasure stole into her cheeks. "Mother did. She said yesterday that this has been the pleasantest summer she had spent for years. I tell you, girls, it pays to be a housemaid when your mother can say that to you!"

Dolls.

A writer in Science, treating of the antiquity of dolls, says that those which were in use among the children of the ancient Egyptians were made of wood, and might be mistaken for modern fabrics.

Undoubtedly they were dressed by the Egyptian girls, as our girls nowadays enjoy dressing their dolls. There were even some the hands and feet of which could be moved by means of strings. Others, made of painted wood, were very imperfect in form, and had strings of beads instead of hair.

In the museum of Leyden there is an ancient toy that looks as though it had been bought at a Christmas fair. There were figures of animals with movable mouths, and balls of leather. Among Greek and Roman antiquities, dolls are found made of wood or clay and others of wax and ivory. Dolls' heads with lead furniture, the saving-box with a slip on top, toy cows, horses, and hogs—all these were known to the children of ancient Rome, as they are to our own.

The women of Bagdad believe that dolls may eventually come to life and harm their children, and therefore they prevent their use. The girls, however, play with cushions and pieces of wood instead. In Siberia and Arctic America ivory dolls, clothed in fur, of beautiful workmanship, are found; in Peruvian graves, dressed dolls of clay; and in Africa the girls play with wooden or clay figures.

The Names of Iowa.

The state derives its name from the tribe known now as the Iowa tribe. Much learning, or at least research, has been wasted in the attempt to show the orthography and definition of this word among the Indians themselvs. While Washington Irving, with the license allowable to an imaginativ writer, states that the meaning of the word is "beautiful," and recounts the incident by which that phrase was first applied to the country, saying that the tribe who in their wanderings arrived at the highest point in the Iowa prairies, looking over the vast expanse of country uninterrupted by hills or swamps, involuntarily uttered the word "Iowa," meaning "beautiful."

But probably a better authority for the meaning of the word was Mr. Antoine Le Claire, a half-breed of the Sac and Fox nations, who always asserted humorously that he was the first white man born in Iowa, though his mother was an Indian. He was employed for many years by the United States as an interpreter in their dealings with the various Indian tribes. His definition of the word was, "Here is the spot—this is the place—to dwell in peace." It is very certain, however, that the name of the state, and the name of one of its secondary rivers, running through a large part of the center of the state, is derived from the name of the tribe.

What the Little Ones Are Saying.

My little two-year-old has added something new to the story of Joseph and his brethren. I told him the Bible version of the story, and he seemed much interested in Joseph's coat of many colors. When I had finished he said: "Papa, tell me about his pants."

The little boy was on his knees in his little night-dress saying his prayers, and his little sister couldn't resist the temptation to tickle the soles of his little feet. He stood it as long as he could, and then said: "Please, God, excuse me, while I knock the stuffing out of Nellie."

"What is an echo?" asked the teacher of the infant class. "It's what you hear when you shout," replied a youngster. "Is it caused by a hill or a hollow?" again asked the teacher. "Both," was the ready reply. "How so?" "The hill throws back the holler."

Sunday-school teacher (to new pupil): "We are taught by the Bible that when some one smites us on the cheek we should turn the other to him. Isn't that a beautiful sentiment?" "Yes, ma'am." "Now, if an enemy were to smite you on one cheek, what would you do?" "I'd pound the top of his head off."

Following is a very curious puzzle. Try it, all of you:

Open a book at random and select a word within the first 10 lines and within the tenth word from the end of the line. Mark the word. Now double the number of the page and multiply the sum by 5.

Then add 20.

Then add the number of the line you hav selected.

Then add 5.

Multiply the sum by 10.

Add the number of the word in the line From this sum subtract 250, and the remainder will indicate in the unit column the number of the word, in the 10 column the number of the line, and the remaining figures the number of the page.

State Abbreviations.

The most egotistical of the United States, "Me.;" the most religious, "Mass.;" most Asiatic, "Ind.;" father of states, "Pa.;" most maidenly, "Miss.;" best in time of flood, "Ark.;" most useful in haying time, "Mo.;" decimal state, "Tenn.;" state of exclamation, "La.;" most astonishing state, "O.;" most unhealthy state, "Ill.;" state to cure the sick, "Md.;" state for students, "Conn.;" state where there is no such word as fail, "Kan.;" not a state for the untidy, "Wash."

THE STRUGGLE
FOR
Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.
A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.
Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world Price 25 cents.

Poetry.

We Must Amuse Him.

If there ever was a God, he has most probably laughed himself to death before now. Just think—not until about three hundred years ago did man know the earth revolved. He knew all about God and heaven: was well posted in regard to hell.—L. N. in The Truth Seeker, July 13, 1889.

With a whirl of thought oppressed,
I sank from reverie to rest;
A horrid vision seized my head,
I saw the graves giv up the dead.
Jove, armed with terror, bursts the skies,
And thunder roars and lightning flies.
Amazed, confused, its fate unknown,
The world stands trembling at his throne,
While each pale sinner hung his head,
Jove, nodding, shook the heavens, and said:
"Offending race of human kind,
By nature, reason, learning, blind,
You who through frailty stepped aside,
And you who never erred from pride;
You who in different sects were shammed,
And came to see each other damned;
So some folks told ye, but they knew
No more of Jove's designs than you.
The world's mad business now is o'er,
And I resent these pranks no more;
I to such blockheads set my wit!
I damn such fools! Go! go! you're bit." *
—Swift.

* Bit—befooled, hoaxed.

The Progress of Nature.

All nature dies and lives again;
The flower that paints the field,
The trees that grace the mountain's brow,
And boughs and blossoms yield,

Resign the honors of their form
At winter's stormy blast,
And leave the naked, leafless plain
A desolated waste.

Yet soon reviving plants and flowers
Anew shall deck the plain,
The woods shall hear the voice of spring,
And flourish green again.

So man, although he fades away,
Lives in another race,
And each doth fill his little round
Of life, of time, and space.
—Abner Kneeland.

There's No Dearth of Kindness.

There's no dearth of kindness
In this world of ours;
Only in our blindness
Take we thorns for flowers;
Onward we are spurning,
Trampling one another,
Yet are inly yearning
At the name of "brother."

There's no dearth of kindness
Or love among mankind,
But in darkling loneness
Hooded hearts grow blind!
Full of kindness tingling,
Soul is shut from soul,
When they might be mingling
In one kindred whole!

As the wild rose bloweth,
Runs the happy river,
Kindness freely floweth
In the heart forever;
But we so much hanker
For the golden dust,
Kindliest hearts will canker,
Brightest spirits rust.

There's no dearth of kindness
In this world of ours;
Only in our blindness
Take we thorns for flowers!
Cherish heaven's giving,
Falling from above,
Life were not worth living,
Were it not for love.—Gerald Massey.

A Warning.

[Translated from the German of Heine, by John Ackerlos.]

Dearest friend, thy fate I see,
If you write such books as these!
Would you gold and honor win,
Servil and humble you must be!

Surely you provoke the Fates,
Thus to speak unto the people,
Thus to speak of priests and parsons,
Thus of kings and potentates.

Friend, your lot excites my fears!
Kings and princes hav long arms,
Priests and parsons hav long tongues,
And the people hav long ears. —Liberty.

"Cranks" and "Kickers."

A Boston clergyman last Sunday took "cranks" and "kickers" as the subject of his Sunday discourse, and held this class of people up to the laudation of his hearers.

It has long been a common term of reproach to call a man a "crank." Probably few people hav reflected long enough to consider all that is implied by this little word of five letters. "Liberator" and "philanthropist" are words that hav been seldom thought of as synonymous with it, though they are its first cousins. A "crank" is one who finds something he dislikes in the social conditions of his time, and, in doing his individual best to eradicate the objectionable feature, incurs the displeasure of his slow-going companions in life and is called a "crank." Nearly all the great and eventually successful reformers were considered "cranks" in their day, and yet we owe very much of all that is best in our civilization to them. It is a hopeful sign of the times when a clergyman drops dry theology for a couple of hours and says a grateful word for the "cranks" and "kickers."—Boston Globe.

A crank is what makes the wheel go round. The cranks may think themselvs happy in that they are only bespattered by an epithet for doing those worthy things which once would hav occasioned their being bound in bundles of fagots and burnt to death in the flames. Bigotry has not lost its turpitude, but its power. Thank the cranks.

In one of our prayer-meetings last July the pastor finished his apostrophe to the power supposed to reign above with the petition that the time might early come in this country "when there shall be no law and no government because all shall know and do the right because it is right, and without dictation."

The remark was offered that for saying just such sentiments four men got hanged and another blew out his brains in Chicago, three years ago. Surely the world moves. All honor to the cranks who turn it. The worst you can do now to one who works for improvement is to call him a crank; it would pay better to examin his ideas.

Meriden, Conn. JOHN P. GUILD.

Paley.

As Christians are so fond in debate of bringing up Paley and his watch argument, it may be well that certain particulars about him and his argument should be known. It was distinctly proved, some years ago, in the Atheneum, that this writer stole his "Natural Theology." The Church and State Gazette thus spoke of the larceny:

Dr. Paley gave to the world, as his own, the "Natural Theology." A work on the same subject, and nearly in the same words, had appeared in Holland, with the name on its title-page of one of Holland's most erudite philosophers, Dr. Bernard Nieuwentyt. From this work, published, we say, long before that of Paley, lengthened extracts are given in the Atheneum; they are contrasted with similar passages from Paley, and these are so similar as to be nearly verbatim reproductions of the original. If the extracts from the Hollander be genuin—which we cannot, unfortunately, doubt—then Paley shines unrivaled in the enormity and splendor of his plagiarisms. In the annals of literary corsairship we never heard of anything equaling piracy like this; and unless the friends and relativs of Paley can submit satisfactory evidence before the tribunal of the public that he has had foul wrong done unto him, his reputation as an honest writer sinks forever beneath the sea of contemptuous oblivion. Who does not remember walking with Paley on the heath and picking up that memorable and wonderful watch, and sitting down to listen to the admirable philosophy imparted thereon, and to heed the charming instruction given upon its anatomy—if we may so call it—and to mark with heart-burning enthusiasm the uses made by our "guide, philosopher, and friend;" and how he led us from the watch in his hand to the origin of all things reposing in the hand of God? Alas! we regret to state it—but for the sake of honesty it should be mentioned that that watch was stolen! It was originally the property of Bernard Nieuwentyt, and Paley filched it from him and exhibited it in England as his own!

Taxation.

From the Baltimore Daily Record.

Editors of the Daily Record: Much has been published recently on the subject of taxation in your paper, which, in the opinion of your correspondent, amounts to very little, as not one of these learned orators comes up to the mark. They all beat around the bush, as the saying goes. Why not take the bull by the horns and demand "Universal Taxation" in reality? Why should the plant be exempted that the rich capitalist makes his thousands out of? Why should any corporation be exempt with its vast privileges, which are often used to the detriment of the public?

Why should all this immense amount of property held by sectarian institutions and private parties be exempted? Besides, these institutions, not satisfied with being exempted from taxation, obtain yearly large sums of the people's money paid into the state treasury for the expenses of the state, which is a further outrage on our taxpayers.

This continued talk about "universal taxation," and yet with no direct attention called to this vast amount of church property and other sectarian institutions, is not meeting the question at all. If the object of these institutions is to benefit mankind, they should not defraud the state. They receive protection, and should pay their just proportion of taxes.

Must the poor man, who pays his taxes on his humble home, also be obliged to pay his money to run these fashionable edifices that he never enters? The foundation of all religion and morality is honesty (or ought to be), next humanity. Is it honest to make a part of the community pay for the accommodation that they hav no part in? Why not exempt every domicil where honesty, morality, and humanity are taught? and perhaps we would find all teaching it. It would be an incentiv, and great good might come from such exemptions. And let the aristocracy that worship in fine temples pay their taxes on them and be honest. It ought to be a pleasure for them to pay for so great a boon as they expect to get through them.

Respectfully, E. LIVEZEY.

Intolerance Toward the Seventh-day Adventists.

From the Review and Herald.

I came to this place June 28th, and began meetings the next day. I hav now held four meetings. The opposition is the most bitter and virulent that I hav ever met during the fourteen years of my ministerial labor. One arrest has been made here for Sunday work, and doubtless others will be made. We write to ask for your prayers and to inform you of the situation. The opposition is not content with persecution, but they hav organized a religious kuklux mob, who use shotguns and revolvers instead of scriptural arguments. A mob of this character raided us last night while we were preaching. They fired fifteen or twenty shots with the evident design to kill. One shot was fired at a brother who sat in a window. They evidently tried to shoot another brother, who is being prosecuted for Sunday work. They also shot through the wall of the frame building in such a way as to cause the ball to pass through the space where I had been standing behind the desk; but I had just stepped from behind it when the bullet crashed through the wall. These shots were fired when there were some sixty persons in the room; but providentially no one was hit. Language becomes tame when we try to find words to express our horror at such intolerant demonstrations.

I closed my meetings at Lane, July 6th. Nearly all the interested ones were so intimidated by the mob violence that they ceased to attend. Those who began to attend were visited in the night with shotguns, and after shooting around them they were threatened, and ordered not to attend the Adventist meetings any more.

Brother King's trial came off the 5th of July. He was fined $3 and costs for working on Sunday. He refuses to pay fines for obeying God. The one who prosecuted the case denied that there was any persecution associated with the case.

We asked the justice of the peace how long he had been acting in the official capacity that he was then filling. He said he had filled the office in that place for eighteen years. We asked him how many persons had been prosecuted in his court for Sunday work during this time. He answered, one person. We then asked him who that person was. He replied, "Robert King." We asked him how many people, he thought, had worked on Sunday during this time. "All of them." This testimony, then, of the official was to the effect that all the people had disregarded the Sunday law for eighteen years, including the one who was prosecuting the case, and not one had been prosecuted except one who had conscientiously kept the seventh day. The justice stated that he regarded Brother King as a man of excellent morals—even one of the best men he had ever known. He said he could only execute the law as a civil magistrate. Thus it is plain that the Sunday law of Tennessee is only used as an inquisitorial machine for the religious persecution of those who keep the seventh day. All are allowed to work on Sunday, provided they do not keep Saturday. WM. COOBERT.

Lane, Tenn., July 9, 1889.

Plain Nonsense vs. Holy Nonsense.

Two small girls liv out in the Northwest. Generally they are model little girls, but occasionally one will hav a fit of tantrums, on which the other will set her seal of disapproval by being so awfully good that chalk would make a black mark on her. The other day Tilly had a tantrum and Mollie was terrifically proper. They were together in the playroom, and their mother overheard the following dialog:

"Tilly, you're bad!"

"'Course I am. I want to be. Gosh! rats! swap! cuss! there, now!"

"Oh, Tilly! you say all those naughty, wicked words on purpose. I am going to pray for you."

"You needn't."

"But I shall, right now."

"If you do, I'll holler so God can't hear you."

"If you can holler louder than I can pray, Tilly, all right; but I don't think you can."

Thereupon Molly began to pray firmly and vigorously and Tilly to bang on the table with a tennis racket and shout at the top of her voice. It went along something like this:

Molly: "O God! Tilly is in a tantrum to-day——"

Tilly: Bang, wow-wow-wow, bang, bang!

"She knows better than to act so——"

Bang! Howdy-rowdy-howdy-rowdy, bang, bang, bang!

"Forgiv her her trespasses, as she does likewise unto others——"

"Aunt Maria had a cat. Her feet all covered with blisters——"

"Giv her this day her daily bread——"

"She had no teeth on the top of her head——"

"And lead her not into temptation——"

"And the wind blew through her whiskers."

"For of such is the kingdom of heaven. Amen."

This was all carried on at the top of their voices until both were compelled to stop for breath.

"That was a healthy old prayer," remarked Tilly.

"I did my duty," replied Molly, severely, "and if God was listening he couldn't help hearing, for I spoke very distinct, but I must say, if you keep on in your evil way, Tilly, you'll bring my gray hairs in sorrow to the grave."

A PRIEST who was examining a confirmation class in the south of Ireland, asked the question: "What is the sacrament of matrimony?" A little girl at the head of the class answered: "'Tis a state of torment into which souls enter to prepare themselvs for another and better world." "Being," said the priest, "the answer for purgatory." "Put her down," says the curate, "put her down to the foot of the class." "Leave her alone," said the priest; "for anything you or I know to the contrary, she may be perfectly right."

Gems of Thought.

IN England the aristocracy are always the first to truckle to power and the last to resist it. The whole of their patriotism is usually confined to studying how they shall best retain the possession of their estates. The extremes of riches and poverty are perhaps equally injurious to political independence; but of the two, the hope which renders the one restless and discontented is not half so contemptible as the fear which induces the other to compromise principle, acquiesce, and sophisticate. In truth, the middle classes form the moral and soul of every country.—The Beacon.

THAT there is a real and practical connection between loyalty and superstition, appears from the historical fact that the two feelings hav nearly always flourished together and decayed together. Indeed, this is what we should expect on mere speculativ grounds, seeing that both feelings are the product of those habits of veneration which make men submissiv in their conduct and credulous in their belief.—Buckle's History of Civilization.

FOR want of having studied or known the true principles of administration, the objects and rights of social life, the real interests of men and their reciprocal duties, princes, in almost every country, hav become licentious, absolute, and perverse; and their subjects abject, wicked, and unhappy.—D'Holbach.

THE science of political economy did not, in the centuries preceding us, exist. Princes estimated not the number of men, but of soldiers, in the state; finance was the mere art of plundering the people, without driving them to a desperation that should end in revolt; and governments paid no other attention to commerce but that of loading it with taxes, of restricting it by privileges, or of disputing for its monopoly.—Condorcet.

IT is impossible after this to regard David as in any sense an upright man. . . . The fact that the historians and others took such a favorable view of David's character, and commended him as a just ruler, is not to be explained by supposing that they knew of things redounding to his credit, which hav not been handed down to us; nor can much stress be laid on the different light in which what we know of him would be regarded in former times. The explanation must be sought simply in the circumstances amidst which these panegyrists lived, and the religious philosophy which determined their views of the history of their people. It was only during the seventy or eighty years of the reigns of David and Solomon that the Israelite tribes formed a single people. The kingdom was afterward split into two and never united again. Now the prophets of Judah, who lived some two centuries later, looked back with a sense of yearning to the golden age of David and his son, under whose scepter Israel had been so powerful. They longed for the union of all the tribes under a king of David's house, and firmly believed that their dream would one day be realized; and since they believed that success and prosperity were incompatible with godlessness, they naturally supposed that the two princes under whom Israel had been so great were very pious. Of David, especially, they unconsciously assumed everything that was good.—The Bible for Learners.

PROF. J. P. MAHAFFY lectured at Chautauqua on the 10th, on the "Irish Question." The great strength of the home rule cause in Ireland lies, he says, in the money that country receives from the United States. He said the home rule movement is not national in any real sense, but an unholy alliance of paid agitators and Romish priests; that it was not safe to giv constitutional liberties while a Roman Catholic majority will distort them into an oppression of the Protestants.

GARIBALDI was a rare hater of priests. He knew them. His "Memoirs," just translated into English, contain several fierce references to the black tribe. "As for this black brood," he says, "this pestilent scum of humanity, this caryatid of thrones, still reeking with the stench of human burnt offerings, where tyranny still reigns, it takes its place among the slaves, and is reckoned among their famished herd." Again, he exclaims, "The priest—ah, he is the veritable scourger of God!"—Western American.

A COMMITTEE of scientists and philosophers, Italian and foreign, has met at Milan with the object of instituting a new "national church." Their first step has been to draw up a catechism and to invite adherents through a manifesto addressed to parents, students, and public officers. The manifesto declares that its promulgators wish to found "a free church in a free state, unfettered by the ideas, prejudices, or dogmas of other creeds, and having for its sole guide the book of nature, with the eternal truths taught therein."

MR. W. S. WELLS, of Wilkesbarre, Pa., is the possessor of a beautiful black and white cocker spaniel, which for intelligence, perhaps, is not surpassed by any dog in the state. Every morning, as soon as Boss hears his master stirring, he brings his slippers, after which he scampers to the front porch for the morning paper, always being careful to close the door after him. Boss never thinks of retiring for the night without first saying his prayers. He places his front feet upon a chair, bows his head reverently, closes his eyes, and nothing but "amen" pronounced by his master will induce him to cease his devotions. The foregoing is the account of the Philadelphia Press. We are not much struck with wonder at the dog's doings over religious mummeries, having seen troops upon troops of asses trained to do the same.

THE Rev. Dr. William E. Degnan, who was appointed superintendent of the New York city Catholic parochial schools, by Archbishop Corrigan, on April 1, 1888, has just finished his first annual report. This will be very interesting, both as to statistics and suggestions, as it is now for the first time that the Catholic schools hav been under a superintendent. As new parishes were created and schools opened, the system became so extensiv that it was deemed advisable to place the schools under one head. In his report he will say that there are sixty-two Catholic parochial schools in the city, and six hundred teachers, mostly belonging to teaching orders, the Christian brothers and sisters of charity. In round numbers there are thirty thousand pupils in the parochial schools. During the year the attendance of the schools increased eight thousand, and eight new schools were started. As soon as a parish is able to support a school one is opened, and it is so generally recognized that if the church is to rear up a new generation of Catholics, to supply the place of the fathers who are passing away, she must look carefully to the schools, that in some new parishes the rector is content with a basement for divine worship, and builds a school before he completes the church.

WITHIN a few years religious matters hav changed in Mexico, says a dispatch from that country. The church has declined astonishingly. It is true that the old people, the women and little children, are truly devout and filled with love and piety for the sufferings of the savior. But a good portion of the young men are open scoffers. All these things are lamented by the padre and the older parishioners, but they are powerless to stay the change, which even they do not half appreciate. Indeed, the change in religious customs and beliefs is not well understood by the people of the United States. Mexico has long been styled "a priest-ridden country." In point of fact, it is a country which is fast becoming rid of the priests. The common idea that in Mexico the church dominates the government and owns vast areas of land and treasure untold is altogether erroneous. Under the present constitution the church lands are confiscated to the state. Church dignitaries cannot hold political office, and are even barred out of the common right of citizenship. Marriage to be legal must be by the civil authorities. Religious processions cannot appear upon the streets and highways. Priests are forbidden to wear their priestly garb except within their churches. Monasteries hav been closed and despoiled of their possessions. The ringing of church bells even is forbidden by law, although sometimes tolerated. Religious sects of all denominations and Infidels and Atheists of all shades of belief are looked upon with impartial eye by the government and on this continent there is not a more complete separation of church and state than in Mexico.

The Origin of Christianity.

Those gentlemen who expect to get a correct idea of the character, belief, and work of Paul, by a study of one or all of his epistles, should remember that the book of Acts, as well as the epistles, is inspired. They should not discredit the book of Acts by neglecting it. There is a very uncomfortable future ahead of any parties who may do so. Possibly God knew his purpose when he gave these books to a fallen world, but, intelligently studied, they edify the world's people, and are a stone of stumbling to the elect. Not being numbered among the elect, I take this occasion to acknowledge myself edified by them. For, being desirous of learning the truth concerning Paul, I consulted the book of Acts, some fifteen pages of which are given to Paul, and the balance, ten more or less, mainly to his bitter opponent, Peter.

Now, I remembered that in the eighth verse of the first chapter of the epistle to the Romans, Paul thanked God, through Jesus Christ, that their faith was proclaimed throughout the world, and, learning that he was to be sent prisoner to Rome, in consequence of charges made against him by certain Jews, I decided to take passage on the same ship with him, and, accordingly, went aboard at the twenty-seventh chapter of Acts, and found myself one of a company of two hundred and seventy-six people, crew and passengers all told. Paul I considered, under the circumstances, for he was a prisoner, very well treated; for on the second day out they put into Sidon, mainly, as it appeared, on his account; and the centurion, who had charge of him, allowed him to go ashore where he had friends, and "refresh," and every yachtsman knows what that means. But after several days, as we did not make much headway, the centurion put us aboard an Alexandrian vessel that was bound to Italy. But ill luck still followed us. It was gales and head winds all the while, and at last, in a heavy storm, we had to throw the freight overboard; and three days afterward we pitched over all the tackling of the ship, everything movable except provisions. We were fourteen days without food (a tough story) when, through the influence of Paul, who was as level-headed as anyone aboard, we turned to just as day was breaking, ate our fill, and then lightened the ship by throwing the wheat overboard. We were lying at this time with four anchors over the stern, but we decided to beach her; so we cut her cables, hoisted the foresail, and let her drive. As soon as her bow struck she began to break up; and then the soldiers advised to kill the prisoners. But the centurion objected on Paul's account, and the result was that all got safe to land, some by swimming and others on loose planks and drift stuff from the ship.

The land on which we were wrecked proved to be an island, and we remained there several months, during which the chronicler of the voyage represents Paul as exercising supernatural powers. For myself I will only say that I think he has overstated what happened. The fact was that the father of the chief landholder of the settlement, who was sick with dysentery, was successfully treated by Paul, who had had some experience with that disease, and his success caused all the sick (and the disease was prevalent there) to be brought to him, and they all recovered. The consequence was that when we chartered the Twin Brothers, an Alexandrian vessel, to take us to Rome, the people, in their gratitude, turned out and provisioned her liberally, and it didn't cost us a cent. After a tedious voyage, during which we touched at several ports, we at last found ourselvs at the Three Taverns in Rome. And here the chronicler makes a great mistake. He says that "the brethren met us at the Three Taverns, and when Paul saw them he thanked God and took courage." Nothing of the kind happened. The fact was that, some time before Paul had sent letters to some thirty of the brethren and sisters (Paul was not a man to slight the sisters) informing them that he was soon going to Spain, and on his way would giv them a call. Two of them, Prisca and Aquila, who had laid down their lives for him years before, he was especially anxious to see, but not one of the thirty came near him then or at any time. Paul, of course, was very much overcome, particularly at the neglect of Prisca and Aquila, and for three days we saw nothing of him. Then, as not a soul had come near him, he invited some of the chief of the Jews to call upon him. They were, evidently, all strangers to him. They had never received any letters from him or about him, but they had heard "of the new sect that was everywhere spoken against," and they asked his opinion of it. He gave them a whole day, talking from morning till night about the law and Moses, and the prophets and Jesus. But all his talk had no effect upon them, and when they left he, in a huff, threw after them a sharp reproof, which is said to hav been originally spoken by the Holy Ghost (possibly God may know what a Holy Ghost is, but I am not posted on ghosts, holy or unholy) through Isaiah, the prophet, to their fathers, the substance of which was that they were a stupid lot, besides being dumb and blind, and he, Paul, would hav nothing more to say to them, but would make the new salvation known to the gentiles, who would accept it. Here we hav been considering two inspired accounts that concern Paul, one of them written by Paul, the other perhaps by his friend Luke, which flatly contradict each other. Both inspired, remember, and, of course, both true. And we are gravely told that this inspired epistle of Paul, which the inspired Luke contradicts, is genuin.

What is the explanation of this confusion? Possibly Jehovah, the author of the inspiration, blundered.

How could a Hebrew God, who had himself been created only two or three centuries and whose jurisdiction had been confined exclusivly to Jews, expect to be able to inspire a man to write Greek, correctly. The thing was impossible, as the result shows us.

A few years ago I expressed the opinion that Ezra invented Jehovah, when he was sent from Babylon to the Persian colony at Jerusalem. But I hav since seen reasons for changing my opinion, and I am now prepared to maintain that Jehovah first saw the light, so to speak, after the conquest of Persia by Alexander the Great. Previous to that time the Persian government had run the church at Jerusalem and paid all the bills, and the god of their worship was the Supreme Intelligence, of whom no graven form was to be made. But after the overthrow of the Persian government, the priests, as a means of establishing themselvs in power, created Jehovah, their most obedient tool and servant, whose detestable character made him so hated of several of the early Gnostic churches, besides the Asiatic church, of which Paul and Marcion were members. Study carefully the books of Ezra and Nehemiah, remembering how intolerant the Persian government was of all religions, destroying all temples, altars, and statues of the gods, and you will see the correctness of the conclusion here presented.

S. PALMER.

No Church in Rome When Paul Arrived There.

Was there a Christian church in the city of Rome before Paul arrived there? None at all if the last chapter of Acts is substantially true. And what reason is there for discrediting that narrativ of Paul's reception?. He was met by a few brethren at Appii Forum, forty-three miles from Rome, and three days after he came to the city he called the principal Jews together to expound to them his new doctrin. Mark now their reply:

> We neither received letters out of Judea concerning thee, neither any of the brethren that came showed or spake any harm of thee. But we desire to hear of thee what thou thinkest; for as concerning this sect, we know that everywhere it is spoken against.

The Syriac version, which is doubtless more correct if not more ancient than the Greek, puts it much stronger, to wit:

> For this doctrin, we know, is not received by anyone.

In other words, there were few or no believers in Christianity in the city of Rome when Paul arrived there.

That Paul wrote a letter to some brethren in Rome some time before he started is quite likely; but that the whole epistle to the Romans was addressed to them is quite improbable. The caption of the epistle is no evidence, and it so happens that the words "in Rome" in chapter i, verse 7, and "at Rome" in verse 15, are omitted in MS. G. The only other evidence that the letter was addressed to the Romans is found in chapter xv, which did not exist in Marcion's copy; that is to say, neither Irenæus nor Tertullian, who frequently quoted from the epistle, made any reference to chapter xv, or indeed to xvi, which is the last. And it is from Irenæus and Tertullian that we derive nearly all our knowledge of Marcion, while Justin, who alludes to Marcion twice as a contemporary heretic, ignores Paul altogether, as if he had never heard of him.

We hav little doubt that Tertullian wrote after the fourteenth century, and suspect the same in regard to Irenæus and Justin.

The authenticity of chapters xv and xvi of the epistle to the Romans is rejected by such able critics as Baur, Lucht, Scholten, Schwegler, Volkmar, Holtzmann, Lipsius, and Zeller.

In chapter xv the writer says:

> From Jerusalem and round about unto Illyricum I hav fully preached the gospel of Christ. Yea, so hav I strived to preach the gospel, not where Christ was named, lest I should build upon another man's foundation. . . . But now having no more place in these parts, and having a great desire these many years to come unto you, whensoever I take my journey into Spain I will come to you; for I trust to see you in my journey, and to be brought on my way thitherward by you, if first I be somewhat filled with your company. But now I go to Jerusalem to minister unto the saints. . . . When therefore I hav performed this, and hav sealed to them the fruit, I will come by you into Spain.

This reads as if the writer intended to stop at Rome only long enough to renew the journey to Spain, hoping to be accompanied thither by some of the Roman brethren. The Syriac version reads: "I hope to come and see you, and that ye will accompany me thither, when I shall be satisfied in some measure with visiting you."

This does not look like a recognition of a Christian church at Rome, and it agrees substantially with the narrativ in Acts, where we are told that Paul was met by a few brethren, who escorted him to that city. There is not only nothing said in that narrativ about a church at Rome, but the plain inference is that there was none. Paul hired a house at his own cost, where he received all that came to him. There, and not in any synagog or other public building, he preached to the gentiles, after making no headway in converting his fellow Jews.

Where, oh, where, was the apostle Simon Kepha, falsely called Peter at this time? Was he bishop of Rome? Not at all; he was never in that city; and he died in the east many years before Paul journeyed to Rome.

The greater part of the last chapter of Romans is made up of salutations and commendations. The brethren and sisters named are twenty-seven in number, not one of whom has been identified as a resident of Rome at the time the epistle is supposed to hav been written. Rufus's mother is termed Paul's mother; Herodion his kinsman; Andronicus and Junea his kinsmen and fellow prisoners, of note among the apostles. Aquila and Priscilla were at Ephesus when Paul wrote 1 Cor. xvi, 19, and again at Ephesus when he wrote 2 Tim. iv, 19, if the latter epistle is genuin.

These and other considerations hav compelled orthodox critics to believe that this part of the epistle is a fragment addressed to some other place than Rome.

It is further to be noted that the epistle is not addressed to a church, like those written to the Corinthians, Galatians, and Thessalonians; nor to elders and deacons, like the epistle to the Philippians. The words bishop, elder, and deacon are not used; and church occurs only in chapter xvi, which does not belong to the epistle. The address is "To all that be in Rome, beloved of God, called to be saints." But as we hav remarked, the words "in Rome" are omitted in MS. G both in this verse and in verse 15. They therefore may hav been interpolated.

But whatever may be the case in regard to the authenticity and integrity of the epistle to the Romans, there is one verse in it that is not true, to wit:

> First, I thank my God through Jesus Christ for you all, that your faith is spoken of throughout the world.

Before Paul went to Rome there were not enough Christians in that city to form a church, and it was a long time before Christianity made much headway there. Paul probably remained longer in Rome than he intended, and doubtless ended his life there.

ANTICHRIST.

A Noble Governor.

[At a clerical assembly at Monona Lake, Wis., on the 2d, Governor Hoard made the following admirable remarks. They will probably procure him bitter animadversion from the pulpits for some time.]

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: I hav been solicited by the managers of this assembly to talk to the clergy. I think the clergy need it. They fill the place, to a certain degree, of public censorship, and thus contract certain habits of thought and education which proceed from being undisputed in what they say.

I wish to be understood in what I shall say. I believe fully in the noble mission of him who would teach men the truths of religion. I believe in the fatherhood of God, and that it is our duty, preachers and people, to do what we can to promote the brotherhood of men.

The principal portion of my creed consists in a belief in "whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report."

Whether this confession of faith is orthodox or not is a matter of little concern to me. But it is a matter of some concern that what I say and do shall prove in some degree encouraging to my fellows in the ways of human goodness.

I hav found, however, even with this short creed, that belief is a great deal easier than performance. It is performance that bothers me.

This little preamble is for the purpose of saying that I wish to be understood as a friend, and not as one who desires to carp or quibble.

I recognize in the pulpit one of the great forces of progressiv civilization. Yet it is a force that is moved upon as much as it moves, and in one sense this is the secret of its success. It is one of the mouthpieces of public conviction. It will shrink and wither like a plucked branch whenever it ceases to stand by the people and for the people. Hence a strong pulpit must, in the best sense, be a popular pulpit. It is the preacher's duty to reach out after the heart of the people. He is a narrow and withered specimen who considers himself only as the partisan of a church or creed to promote church growth and not public growth. He may help the church but not the people. We greatly need a larger infusion of the spirit of citizenship among our clergy as a class. President Hayes said in one of his messages: "He serves his party best who serves his country best." That is true of political parties, and just as true of churches and preachers.

There is a natural tendency in pulpit life, as in political life, to contract the habit of blind partisanship. We see plenty of men who are more partisan than they are patriotic—to whom the party utterance is all in all. So we see preachers and parishioners whose convictions of duty toward the public never get beyond the church definition. This partisanship leads them away from public contact, public sympathies, public understanding, and what is more than all, public education.

I often hear preachers ascribe the progress of civilization as being entirely due to the work of Christianity. This I think is undue partisanship. They forget that something there is that has civilized Christianity itself. The Christianity of the Dark Ages is a vastly different thing from that which shines to-day. Then it was barbarous; to-day it is civilized. What has wrought the change? The growth of knowledge among the common people.

Any system of religion must be met by intelligence in the masses if it be kept pure and wholesome, for, like all human agencies, it is bound to take color from its surroundings. Religion among the plantation negroes of Louisiana to-day is as much pagan as Christian. Mere blind worship will never correct this; the growth of knowledge and the expansion of the reason alone can do it. The Hindoo poet well says:

> When the fish swim out of the water,
> And the birds soar out of the blue,
> Man's thoughts may transcend man's knowledge,
> And your God be no reflex of you.

The growth of justice in the hearts of the people has taught the church many useful lessons, and shown it where it has made many grievous mistakes. For this reason I am not a believer in that semi-divine idea of the clergy, the pulpit, or the church which seems in all ages to hav found lodgment in the minds of so many.

I cannot forget that when Christ came to teach men a purer and more humane form of worship, a form more just to God and man than any that had preceded it, the best he could get for apostles was a choice of sinners, and so it has continued to this day. I am none the less interested, however, in the success of the pulpit in dealing with the hearts of men. I want to see those of my fellow-sinners who are chosen for this work achieve the widest influence possible. I note with regret the growth of any force in society, whether it come from the clergy or outside, which shall lessen that influence. Yet I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that with a large majority of men there is felt but little need, individually, of the distinctiv work of the preacher. They cannot just exactly see how the preacher helps them in the daily contentions of life. They will, in a sort of theatrical way, conclude that the pulpit is a good thing for society. They pay ungrudgingly for its support, but usually they content themselvs with letting their wives bear the burden of activ work in the church. This is not because they hav not moral purpose; it is for no lack of conscience or love of goodness, for as a rule they are "four square to all the winds that blow." They maintain no such attitude toward the school or newspaper. They take ready hold of these forces for their individual benefit. I am somewhat puzzled at this state of affairs, and none the less so because I find I am as deep in the mire as anybody. I am not satisfied with such a state of a airs, nor am I satisfied with the explanation which is so generally offered. I am told that it is because I am perverse and unregenerate, and that I am not in sympathy with the work of the pulpit. That explanation is too cheaply offered.

Christ said to Peter, "Feed my sheep." To my mind it is a question of feed. The law of demand and supply governs in things spiritual as well as things temporal. Which comes first? Shall it be my necessity, my hunger, which shall take me to church, or the necessity and hunger of the preacher? If the preacher does not conform to this great law, can he justly complain if the activ men of affairs do not accept his proffered feed?

Hav you critically examined the food to see whether or not it is musty with age? Whether or not it was cut and dried for some one else? Whether or not it is living reason or dead dogma that you hand out? The men you ask to take your feed can reason and discriminate. They hav just as sharp discernment as yourselvs. If they show a lack of sympathy with your work it is not because of a lack of reverence for your master. Their sharp contact with life brings to them the necessity of character rather than abstract belief. They feel the need of that sort of feed that shall strengthen and sustain, from their standpoint, not yours. You ask me to come to church. I am struggling six days in the week with the hard problems of life and with the temptation to lie, cheat and wrong my neighbor. Yet, when I go to church, I hear ten sermons against Sabbath-breaking—a mere sin of statute, to one against lying. The pulpit standard of goodness is too theoretical. This sort of preaching does not feed me; there is no resisting power in it.

I am reminded here of a story. In the old slavery days, a planter accosted one of his hands one morning and the following colloquy ensued:

"Hello, Uncle Pete; I hear you are getting to be a great preacher among the darkies."

"Yes, massa, de Lord open my mouf 'casion'ly."

"Well, Pete, what do you preach on?"

"De sins ob de people, massa."

"That's a good subject, Pete; and by the way, you can be of some service to me, for you darkies are cleaning out my hen roost and ham house at a great rate, and I want you to preach against stealing."

The old darkey shook his head and said: "Can't do it, massa. If I'd go to preachin' on dem ar' subjects, dat 'ud frow a coldness ober de meetin'."

I need a fearless analyzer of my situation in life, as I find it, not as the preacher finds it in his study. I need a counselor, who, like his master, has been tempted on all points like as I am, who will reach into the current and shout, "Don't get discouraged; stick to it." I need to hear the gospel of courage, for everything, from my own greed to the malice of others, tends to make me a moral coward. I need to hear the gospel of a sound moral judgment, that which is born of a knowledge of men and the tides and currents of human affairs.

The selfishness of our nature is an ever present, upspringing quantity with us, no matter how we dress our bodies or our speech. There is a world of low-down meanness walking around in broadcloth and silk dresses. The greed for power, social or political, the ever-consuming greed for money, is making men and women "hollow to the whitewash."

There is a hunger in the heart of to-day that more than anything else the words and spirit of Christ satisfy. But that hunger pays no attention to the fictions which surround the fruit as a garment of other men's wearing. The preacher who reaches into the soul of the ninteenth century must be a transparent interpreter of the Sermon on the Mount, not of Paul, nor John, nor the fathers, nor Calvin, nor Knox, nor Wesley, nor creeds. In everything Christ was rational, not dogmatic; hence dogmatism crucified him. So it has and so it will every human heart that reaches out the wan hands of spiritual hunger.

The preacher is needed to-day just as much and more than ever, if he will only, like his master, seek his field. To the poor and the ignorant Christ came first. To-day they are served last. It will do the preacher a world of good to broaden his understanding of human nature in this respect, as did his master. Too much is the simplicity of the gospel covered up with the purple of ambition. Pride of intellectual display on the part of the pulpit and aristocratic exclusivness on the part of the congregation often cause men of the world to ask, in all honesty: "Is this the religion founded by Jesus Christ?" In that wonderful analysis of Shakspere by Victor Hugo occurs the following appeal to the poet. It applies to the preacher and the teacher everywhere. I will read it:
